Mr. NELSON. Is this demand for increased wages on their part accompanied by a threat to strike?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know. The Senator from Minnesota will have to inform himself upon that point from other sources. All that I am suggesting is that we do not inflame the existing situation; that we look upon every part of it coolly and deliberately, and speak temperately with regard to it.

Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss the questions that are suggested by the Senator from Minnesota; they have no relation whatever to the matter I am about to submit to the Senate. There will be abundant opportunity in the very near future for the people of the country and for the Senate to consider all these very difficult and doubtful propositions. I arose for the purpose of correcting what I believe to be a false impression which has been created, unintentionally I hope, by certain interviews which have been published as emanating from the Director General of Railroads.

On Friday last, as chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, I received a letter from the President of the United States. I now read it and make it public, because I assume, and I am sure that the President recognizes, that it is a public matter. It is dated August 1, 1919, and is as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, August 1, 1919.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I take the liberty of inclosing a copy of a letter which I have just received from Mr. Walker D. Hines, the Director General of Railroads, and which I am sure you will agree with me in thinking contains matter for very serious thought and for action also.

May I not say that I concur in the suggestions which Mr. Hines makes in the two concluding paragraphs of his letter? I hope that it will be possible for your committee to consider and recommend legislation which will provide a body of the proper constitution authorized to investigate and determine all questions concerning the wages of railway employees, and which will also make the decisions of that body mandatory upon the rate-making body, and provide, when necessary, increased rates to cover any recommended increses in wages, and, therefore, in the cost of operating the railroads. In view also of the indisputable facts with regard to the increased cost of living, I concur in Mr. Hines's suggestion that the legislation undertaken should authorize the body thus set up to make its findings with regard to wage increases retroactive to the 1st of August, 1919, at any rate to the extent that that tribunal may regard reasonable and proper, in order to give real relief to the employees concerned.

I need not, I am sure, urge upon you the importance of this matter, which seems vital from more than one point of view, and I hope that you will think this form of action the proper and necessary one.

Cordially and sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

Hon. ALBERT B. CUMMINS,
Chairman Committee on Interstate Commerce,
United States Senate.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am informed—and the Senator from Iowa will correct me if my information is wrong—that an increase of 1 cent per hour in the wages of these employees is the equivalent of $50,000,000 per annum, which, at 16 cents, would be $800,000,000. Is that correct?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the letter of the Director General of Railroads, which the President has inclosed to me, makes a statement approximately like the statement just made by the Senator from Colorado. The Director General says this:

> We have received the most positive assurances that any general increases to shop employees will result in demands for corresponding increases to every other class of railroad employees. The situation therefore can not be viewed except as a whole for the entire 2,000,000 railroad employees. Viewing it as a whole, every increase of 1 cent per hour means an increase of $50,000,000 per year in operating expenses for straight time, with a substantial addition for necessary overtime. An increase of 12 cents per hour—— > as asked for by the shop employees, would, if applied to all employees, mean (including necessary overtime) an increase of probably $800,000,000 per year in operating expenses.

That is the demand of the shopmen—an increase from 68 cents an hour to 80 cents an hour—

An increase of 16 cents per hour would amount to something like $200,000,000 more, namely, to $1,000,000,000.

Mr. THOMAS. Then the position of the trainmen virtually is that their wages shall be increased at the rate of $800,000,000 a year in order to meet the increased cost of living?

Mr. CUMMINS. If a proportionate increase shall be awarded to all railway workers, the increase annually would be $800,000,000.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the Senator will agree with me that the effect of such a raise would merely be proportionately to increase the cost of the necessities of life, while the public, as usual, pays the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Unquestionably, Mr. President, that would be its effect, and its effect in that respect is fully recognized by the railway men, and their demand, as I understand, is in the alternative, either such an increase in their compensation or a reduction in the cost of living, so that their present wages will be relatively the same as though increased.

Mr. THOMAS. That is to say, either control the law of gravitation or abolish it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not intending to discuss the subject of the propriety of the increase in wages nor the futile attempts that may be made or that have been made to decrease the cost of living. Personally, while I think that many things might be done that would have some effect upon the cost of living, we will have to depend mainly upon the natural development of commerce and business, and in some way that no human being can now fairly anticipate resume the relations which were established before the war and which will take a long time again to establish. We must bear the consequences of this war. They will not be borne simply by paying the expenses of the war. The whole world is dislocated; all its relations are changed, and just how we will reach the point of safety and again feel the security of the old-established relations between employers and employees and between the various transactions of commerce I do not know, nor do I believe that any human being can foretell.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, it seems to me that, of course, the best possible thing to do is to have action by Congress as to the railroads as quickly as possible, because only by congressional action can the railroad question be definitely settled, and I am wondering if the Senator, as chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, can tell us with any degree of certainty when we are going to have a report from the committee as to the legislation necessary either to restore the railroads to their owners or to take whatever course the committee may recommend?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not intend to be drawn into a discussion of the question of the reorganization of our system of railway control at this time.

Mr. McKELLAR. That was not my purpose. I was wondering what action the committee had taken, or when it will take action, so that the matter can be discussed by the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. Nor do I believe that any system of railway regulation or control will meet the emergency that now confronts us; but I am glad to answer the question of the Senator from Tennessee. The Committee on Interstate Commerce began the moment it was organized to consider the general subject of railway reorganization. It will be remembered, although possibly it is not generally known, that during the last winter and spring there were submitted to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, with most elaborate arguments, at least 10 distinct, complete, independent plans for the reorganization of the relations between the Government and the railroads, all of them coming from very thoughtful men, and all of them being exceedingly well considered in their development and in their argument. As chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce there have been submitted to me, including those submitted to the committee, more than 30 distinct, independent, complete plans for the readjustment of the relations between the Government and the railroads. They are as various as the minds from which they come; they are all worthy of careful consideration. The subject itself is so broad and comprehensive as to tax the best of thought of any mind. Our committee has been considering these plans from the very beginning. It is now operating through a subcommittee. We have been discussing the fundamental principles which ought to control the legislation which we hope to propose. We have made excellent gratifying progress in those discussions; and all that I care to say at this time with regard to the matter—for I would not want to fix a definite time for a report—is that long before the Senate has disposed of the league of nations the Committee on Interstate Commerce will be ready to report a bill; we all fear that the Senate would be in no frame of mind to consider this very vital subject until the league of nations or the treaty with Germany is disposed of. If the Senate could find time to take up some of our domestic problems, for the safety of our own people, and to avert a catastrophe which thoughtful men believe may occur at any moment, instead of spending so much of its time on foreign affairs, I believe the country and I know our committee would be better satisfied.

Mr. THOMAS. In other words, Mr. President, the Senator is of the opinion that if we must choose between the two, peace at home is preferable to peace abroad?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am thoroughly of that opinion, Mr. President.

Mr. THOMAS. So am I.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am shuddering all the time lest, in our concern for the downtrodden people of Europe, we will suffer the same disasters through which they are now passing.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. KIRBY. I understand that the Government is operating the railroads already at a loss of about $30,000,000 a month. I have not seen the document that the Senator read this morning, but I should like to know what is the estimated loss in operation under Government control if the demand as made here is granted without any increase in rates?

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course if the wages are increased as demanded, and there are no increases in revenues, the deficit will be just so much more. I am assuming that an advance in rates will mean an advance in revenues. That is not always true.

Mr. THOMAS. But, Mr. President, that means, does it not, in the end that it is a case, so far as the people are concerned, of "heads I win; tails you lose"?

Mr. CUMMINS. I would not care to affirm that suggestion in terms, but it is something very nearly that.

But I have been digressing. I rose for the purpose of indicating to the country and to the Senate that the Railroad Administration has full power to deal with the situation without an appeal to Congress. We have already given to the President and to the Director General all the powers that are necessary to deal as their judgment may suggest with the very condition that has now arisen. I would not consider it necessary to do this if it were not for an interview published, as I said a moment ago, in last night's Evening Star, coming from Mr. Hines; and I must not be understood as disparaging Mr. Hines. I think he is one of the ablest men who have ever attempted the management of railroads. I am bound to say that he is a great improvement over his predecessor, although I do not care to criticize his predecessor, save that he did not know the business in which he was engaged.

Director General Hines to-day explained to a group of representative labor leaders that he had asked President Wilson to have Congress take up the question of increased wages because he believed the Railroad Administration virtually had been shorn of the power to increase rates to meet such advances.

The Director General said passage of a bill by the Senate to restore the Interstate Commerce Commission its power to suspend proposed increases was tantamount to putting the Director General on notice that Congress disapproved of increases except by the rate-making body.

Mr. Hines also explained the financial situation of the Railroad Administration and invited the railroad men to give any suggestions they cared to have incorporated in the bill which he plans to present to Congress.

The Committee on Interstate Commerce intends to give careful consideration to the recommendation of the President, and I do not even predict what the action of the committee will be in response to his suggestion; but I do say that it is unfair to Congress, both the Senate and the House, to issue a statement to the country that the situation can not be dealt with by the Railroad Administration until additional legislation is enacted. The President has the absolute power, through the Director General, to fix the wages of all railway employees. The Government of the United States is the employer. It can hire, it can discharge, any employee. It can determine precisely what each employee shall receive for the service he renders. There can be no question whatsoever with regard to his power in that regard. He can fix the rates which shall be charged for transportation and make them effective at any time he may determine. There can be no doubt whatsoever with regard to that power, because it is expressly given to the President and to the Director General in the act of March 21, 1918, respecting Federal control.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator speaks of the power of the President. Is it not more than power? Does not the duty devolve upon the President as well as the power?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it is impossible for me to conceive of power without duty.

Mr. OVERMAN. But we have taken away from him the right to initiate rates.

Mr. LENROOT. No.

Mr. CUMMINS. No, Mr. President; that is the very misapprehension which has been created. We have not taken from him the power to initiate rates. We have not taken from him any power whatsoever. It is true that a month ago or more the Senate passed the bill, which I introduced, restoring to the Interstate Commerce Commission the authority to suspend rates which might be initiated by the President or the Director General, just as it might have suspended before the war rates that were initiated by railway companies; but, Mr. President, the bill to which I have just referred has not become a law. It has been obstructed in the House of Representatives by the Railroad Administration itself, and it was not until yesterday that the bill was reported to the House by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in the House. I am still in favor of that law, and I am not insisting that we should not—indeed, I am insisting that we must—pass a law so that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have the power, if it believes it should be exercised, to suspend rates made by the Director General. But the authority, as well as the duty, of fixing wages at the present time rests with the Director General. The authority, as well as the duty, of initiating rates which may be necessary to meet the demands for increased wages or the increased cost of transportation rests with the Director General, and it will rest with him after the act to which I have just referred has passed the House and becomes a law.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator what the increase is now over the rates as they were before the Government took control? My information is that the average increase, as compared with the old rates, is between 25 and 30 per cent. Is that correct?

Mr. CUMMINS. It was said at the time to be an increase of 25 per cent, and there is a sense in which that is true; but when the orders of the Director General were applied to the actual affairs of transportation it resulted in increasing the rates in some instances less than 25 per cent and in many instances a great deal more than 25 per cent; in some cases as high as 100 per cent and in rare instances even more than that.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. The testimony before our committee—and I think I quote accurately Mr. Clifford Thorne, who is an expert who has given a good deal of attention to these subjects—was that the rates on coarse grades of freight in the Central West were increased from 50 to 60 per cent, and there was testimony as to certain articles from New Orleans northward that were increased 240 per cent; and one of the members of the committee made the statement in open session of the committee that in certain sections of the South the increases in rates were as high as 500 per cent. This was largely due, as I understood it, to some changes which were made in classification by a new rate-fixing committee that was organized by the Director General, which was never in the contemplation of Congress.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Ohio has stated the matter with accuracy, as it has been developed before our committee. Possibly a better understanding of the effect of the increases in rates may be had if I refer to the result of the increases in rates.

This general increase was put into effect in May and June, 1918. The rates were therefore operative only during substantially a half year, prior to the 1st of January, 1919. The gross revenues of all the railroads in the possession of the Government for the year 1917 were, in round numbers, $4,100,000,000. The gross revenues of the railroads in Government control for the year 1918 were about $4,900,000,000. The volume of traffic was slightly less in 1918 as compared with 1917. So it is fair to deduce the conclusion that the increased rates operating for substantially seven and a half months of the year 1918 resulted in an increase in gross revenue of $800,000,000, and if they had been in effect during the entire year upon a similar volume and kind of traffic the increased rates would have aggregated in increased revenue a little more than $1,400,000,000.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I think the Senator ought to state the other side of the ledger. The operating expenses increased something like five or six hundred millions more than the increase in income.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Minnesota has overstated that a trifle, but, nevertheless, the substance of his remark is true, for either through increased wages, increased cost of supplies, inefficiency in operation, or the increase in the number of employees, the operating revenue of the railways under Federal control resulted in a deficit of $250,000,000 for 1918.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator, in connection with the expenses, whether under the provisions of the law in regard to the guaranteeing of dividends to the various railroads they have been in every case contracted for on the maximum amount provided by law; and if that is true, or if it is true to some extent, what effect has it had upon the expense side of the ledger?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not examined all the contracts which have been made, but I do not know of any contract made with a railroad company in which the compensation agreed to be paid by the Government for the use of the property was less than the maximum amount provided for.

Mr. NORRIS. If that be true, then there are a great many stockholders of railroad companies who are now being paid dividends running all the way from 10 to 50 per cent. Take the Burlington road, for instance, with which the Senator is familiar.

Mr. CUMMINS. As I pointed out when we had the railroad-control act under consideration, the compensation that was provided to be paid to many of the railroads was excessively high.

Mr. NORRIS. The point I want to get at is whether if we paid a reasonable rate it would not so materially reduce the expense of operation that all these increases would be unnecessary.

Mr. CUMMINS. I can only express my own opinion. The Senator from Nebraska will remember that during the consideration of the act, in March, 1918, I insisted very earnestly and with all my strength that the compensation which we were agreeing to pay to the big railroads was $250,000,000 per year more than we should have agreed to pay.

Mr. NORRIS. I was one of the Senator's humble followers in that fight; but we did not require the President to pay this maximum rate, and it was said, in answer to our argument, that it would not be paid as a matter of practice. I am trying to find out whether it is paid as a matter of practice.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is paid.

Mr. NORRIS. If that be true, then there are a great many instances where the cost of operation could be very materially reduced. For instance, in the case of the Burlington Railroad—which I just happen to remember, because I live on it, and I am familiar with it, as the Senator from Iowa is—the rate of dividends that they would get, if they made the contract on the maximum basis, would be 22½ per cent annually on all their stock.

Mr. CUMMINS. As I remember it, it was a trifle more than that. I think the contract with the Burlington gives it compensation which would enable it to pay somewhat more than 22½ per cent, although I have not personally examined the contract.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the exact figure, as I remember it.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. The question of the compensation paid the railroads has nothing to do with the operating expenses, and it is not figured in the operating expenses. The operating expenses I was talking about are the ordinary operating expenses of the road.

Mr. NORRIS. I was not talking about the same thing, probably.

Mr. KELLOGG. I think not.

Mr. NORRIS. But the amount we pay the railroads does enter into this problem very materially, because we have to pay it either from the Treasury of the United States or in rates on the railroads.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it enters into it to just this extent, that if we had paid the railroads $200,000,000 less as compensation during the year 1918, instead of being compelled to go to the Treasury of the United States for $240,000,000 in order to pay them, we would have been compelled to go to the Treasury for only $25,000,000 or $30,000,000 in order to pay them.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I think it, perhaps, ought to be stated, in fairness to all parties concerned, that the rate which it was arranged to pay—that is, the maximum rate of dividends—should not be in excess of the dividends which were paid in peace times. In other words, the committee and the Congress were trying to pay compensation for these properties on the same basis on which they were earning prior to their being taken over. If every other property and every other enterprise had been dealt with as strictly as were the railroads, we would not have had many of these fat corporations and very large incomes.

But that is not what I rose to suggest. The Senator from Iowa a moment ago was discussing the increase in the expense account of the railroads. Am I not right in the statement that the Director General said to us in the committee that with the increased rates provided for in the so-called 25 per cent increase and with the increased wage that was to be paid at the end of a full year there would be a net surplus of more than $100,000,000 for the year, and instead of meeting that situation we are met under the present management with a monthly deficit, notwithstanding these increases?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, my recollection is that the former Director General made before our committee the statement that all the losses for the year 1918 would be recovered during the year 1919 under the increases in the rates which had been promulgated by him. I do not remember that the present Director General was quite so optimistic in regard to the outcome of the year 1919. He hoped, he said, that the greater business incident to the moving of the crops and the revival of commerce in the fall of the year 1919 might enable him to close this year without loss. Of course, his experience has not verified or fulfilled his predictions. We lost $240,000,000 last year, and we lost in the first four or five months of this year $260,000,000, and we are now losing at the rate of $39,000,000 per month.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. And at the same time cars are not being furnished in sufficient numbers to accommodate the traffic. Just the other day I had a letter from the secretary of agriculture of the State of Ohio stating that there were then needed in that section 8,000 cars for the purpose of hauling fertilizers for the farmers' seeding this fall, and it is next to impossible to get the cars. I am having the subject up now with the Director General's office. On yesterday I called attention to what I believe to be the situation, namely, that there are not cars in sufficient numbers furnished to the coal operators to afford the necessary transportation for coal, and the fall season is now almost upon us.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not sure that the Senator from Iowa understood the suggestion I desired to make a while ago. Perhaps I did not make myself plain. I realize that the Director General, of course, has a right now to make rates and to fix wages, and primarily it is his duty to do so. I realize also the stupendousness of the task of the committee, as the Senator from Iowa has pointed out. The many plans proposed must have the careful consideration of the committee. We all realize that. I realize also that Senators have been concerned somewhat about the league of nations, but that treaty does not come before the Interstate Commerce Committee primarily. I agree with all the facts that the Senator from Iowa has stated, and especially the fact that the Government is losing large sums of money, and particularly the fact that in this period of transition, of unrest, the whole country is looking to Congress as the only body which has the right to make a permanent policy for the railroads. My suggestion is, therefore, that the sooner we get to that permanent policy, manifestly, to my mind, the better the country will be off. Congress must act and produce a permanent policy for the railroads before we can hope for any relief from the many ills that now confront these railroads. We can not shift that responsibility to other shoulders.

Mr. CUMMINS. I quite concur in the statement just made by the Senator from Tennessee, and I promise him that long before the Senate is in position to take up for consideration the railroad problem the report of the committee will be before the Senate.

Mr. President, we have drifted into a discussion which is not valueless, but I recall myself at least to the point I desire to make. The Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate is desirous of cooperating with the President and with the Director General in every practical and just way. The chairman of that committee is exceedingly anxious to cooperate with the President in bringing order out of chaos and in preparing to meet what I grant to be a most serious condition. But in justice to the committee and in justice to the Senate and in justice to the House I could not permit the impression to become fixed among the people of the country that the delay in dealing with this subject is the delay of Congress. I do not enter upon the question whether the President should not delay, or whether the Director General should not delay the raising of wages and the increase of rates. I am not passing upon that. I am neither approving nor condemning the policy which he has pursued in that regard; but I do hope that the people of this country will understand that if wages are to be raised and if they ought to be raised now, the Director General has the power to raise them. I hope the country will know that if rates are to be increased or ought to be increased in order to meet the increased cost of maintenance and operation, the Director General has the power to raise them.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Has the Director General indicated that, in his judgment, the rate of wages should be raised?

Mr. CUMMINS. Not to me, except in that general way in which all of us consider every demand for increase of wages. It is generally understood, I think, that the rapidly increasing cost of living is demanding or is justifying an increase of wages everywhere if the proper relation between wages and the cost of living is to be preserved.

Mr. POMERENE. I do not know of anyone who is in a better position to know whether they ought or ought not to be raised than the Director General. A formal communication has been presented to the committee bearing generally upon this subject, but I confess that it looks to me as if it were the desire to pass the responsibility. Of course, I am not qualified to be the Director General of Railroads, but I think if I were Director General of Railroads I would have the courage to say either that there ought or ought not to be an increase of wages, or I would resign.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, all I am interested in establishing is that the power resides with the Director General both to increase wages and to increase rates, and as the law now is, the rates could be made effective at any time determined by the Director General.

Mr. KING and Mr. WATSON addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield first to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think, notwithstanding the Director General has the power to fix rates and to increase wages, or to lower them, if he desires, in view of the legislation which is now imminent upon the part of Congress and in view of the unsettled and unstable condition of the economic and industrial world, it would be unwise upon his part to take the responsibility to increase wages, at least to increase them to any material extent at this time?

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator from Utah mean the general legislation in view respecting the reorganization of railways or the particular legislation which is asked in the letter of the President to me?

Mr. KING. I have in mind the general legislation pending before the committee for the reorganization of the railroads, turning them over, probably, to their owners, and the bill which the Senator from Iowa introduced and which passed the Senate and which has gone to the House.

Mr. CUMMINS. If we can wait until the general legislation is determined, then there is no emergency. I have assumed that the President was of the opinion, according to his letter to me, and I know that he is of that opinion and I know that the Director General is of that opinion also, that we have an acute and imminent situation which must be dealt with. What he asks us to do is to pass a law which will create a new board for the fixing of railway wages and to adopt a direction to the Interstate Commerce Commission that it shall increase rates in accordance with the increase in the cost of operation. If that is imminent, if it is emergent, and I believe it is, whether it should be done within a week or a month, I do not know, but I am sure it must be dealt with before we can hope to pass a general reorganization bill. I am not saying that I am not willing to take my share of the responsibility. I am willing to assume it, but I do not think it fair or just that the impression should go to the country that the administration is powerless to meet the situation until Congress acts, and that is always accompanied by the statement of the newspapers that Congress is unduly slow and reluctant to act upon any grave and vital matter.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico and Mr. KING addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire first to yield to the Senator from Indiana, who requested me to yield a moment ago.

Mr. WATSON. The specific thing that the President asked us to do is to create this board, is it not?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; to create the board and direct the Interstate Commerce Commmission.

Mr. WATSON. Does not the Senator believe the President himself has authority to appoint a board for the purpose of advising him as to increases in rates and in wages, because if the authority now rests with him, as undoubtedly it does, to raise wages or to increase rates, he has the right to appoint any board or commission or to establish any agency that he might deem appropriate for the purpose of advising him, has he not?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Director General has just the same right to take advice in regard to wages that shall be paid railway employees that I would have if I were hiring a person to render service for me. He is not limited in the scope of his power, and there is nothing that he wants to do that he can not do, with regard to securing all the information that is necessary to enable him to exercise his own judgment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. It is rather more than a question, and I apologize to the Senator. Complaint has been made heretofore because the Executive, acting through the Director General, has imposed increased rates for passengers and freight, and it has been charged that that has proved to be a burden upon the owners of the railroads; that it is unfair for the Government to take over the railroads and to saddle upon the owners such a large increase in operating expenses. Does not the Senator think, in view of those charges or criticisms, and perhaps there is some little merit in them, that there would be greater ground for criticism if the President and the Director General should add additional burdens to the owners of the roads and to the public by increasing the wages? In other words, does not the Senator think it is far better, if such an important step is to be taken, particularly in view of the fact that the whole subject is before Congress, that Congress should legislate and direct whether there shall be an increase in wages, and if so to advise the means by which that increase shall be made?

Mr. CUMMINS. That depends entirely upon one question. Have the people of the country more confidence in the President than they have in Congress? What does the Senator from Utah say in regard to that?

Mr. KING. I do not know that that is a very fair question to ask. I leave it to the Senator from Iowa to determine whether this body has the confidence of the people and whether the House has the confidence of the people as much as the President has. I do not think that is a determinative point in the question which I propounded or the suggestion which I made.

Mr. CUMMINS. No matter what law we pass, if the House enacts the bill that passed the Senate a short while ago restoring to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to suspend rates that are initiated by the Director General, the Director General will be compelled to decide for himself whether the rates for transportation shall be raised or lowered. There is no one who can share that responsibility with him. He is an executive officer and in full control of the railway companies, and he must determine whether the rates shall be advanced or not. Then the Interstate Commerce Commission, reviewing the entire situation, may, if it sees fit, suspend those rates for examination. If the Interstate Commerce Commission should suspend the rates, then the Director General is relieved of responsibility, and it falls upon the Interstate Commerce Commission, where, in my judgment, it ought finally to rest. The final decision with regard to the reasonableness of rates should remain with the Interstate Commerce Commission, but there is no escape from responsibility on the part of the operator—in this instance the Director General—of the railway property in determining whether the rates which he is charging for transportation are adequate or inadequate. So there is no legislation that we can adopt, so far as rates are concerned, that will relieve the Director General.

The only thing we can do that would share the responsibility with the President, so long as Federal control shall continue, is this: We can pass a law authorizing the President to appoint a board for the purpose of determining wages, and in doing so we become, in a measure, a sharer with him in the responsibility for the wages that are established. That is the only thing we could possibly do, and that the President has the right to do now. He may desire to wait until Congress either does that thing or refuses to do that thing, but he can not, and must not, stand before the country as being powerless to meet the situation which now exists, and which I believe, and which every thinking man must believe, is not only imminent but exceedingly serious.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, I will state the way this proposition presents itself to me:

The Congress of the United States, under the exercise of the war power, took over the operation of certain of the railroads of the United States. It was understood that was necessary to meet a war emergency, and that upon the termination of the war the railroads should be restored to their owners. The President of the United States, deeming the time propitious, recommended a restoration of the railroads to their owners, and asked Congress to take up the question and pass appropriate legislation that might be necessary to effectuate that object. Congress is dealing with that subject now; important committees are considering plans for the accomplishment of that purpose. The Senator from Iowa has stated that 30 plans have been submitted for consideration.

It seems to me, in the light of the fact that the railroads are soon to go back to their owners—I hope so; I hope we shall have the courage to do the right thing—that the President ought to halt in any course that would increase the burdens upon the owners of the railroads or change the status quo, and that the Congress, at the earliest possible moment, ought to enact such legislation as will accomplish the desired result.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the President of the United States does not concur with the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], for he believes that there ought to be something done immediately, and I concur with him in that regard. We can not wait until the general reorganization of the railways shall be determined upon. If the situation is as perilous as indicated by the Director General and by the President—and I believe it to be—something must be done in the very near future. All that I am trying to do is to inform the American people that there is nothing that Congress can do in the matter that it has not already done, except to authorize the appointment of a board. I am not saying whether we ought to do that or not; I am expressing no opinion upon that whatsoever; but I am endeavoring to dispel an illusion or misapprehension that has gone abroad throughout the length and breadth of the country with respect to the existing power of the President.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. If I understood the letter of the Director General, he has construed the bill of which the Senator spoke, of which he is the author, and which passed the Senate, as taking from him the power to fix rates.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think not.

Mr. OVERMAN. He construes it differently from the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. He has not so construed it, so far as I know.

Mr. OVERMAN. I so understood it from the reading of the letter.

Mr. CUMMINS. It would be impossible for him to so construe it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to have the Senator from Iowa read what the Director General says about that matter.

Mr. CUMMINS. He does not say a word about it, so far as I remember, in his letter to the President, but he does say a great deal about it——

Mr. OVERMAN. It was the interview, probably, that I had in mind.

Mr. CUMMINS. But he does say a great deal about it in the interview. In the interview the Director General of Railroads says:

Passage of a bill by the Senate to restore the Interstate Commerce Commission its power to suspend proposed increases—

How could the Interstate Commerce Commission suspend an increase until it was ordered? It has no power to proceed except upon the act of the Director General—was tantamount to putting the Director General on notice that Congress disapproved of increases except by the rate-making body.

Congress has not expressed any such disapproval; it has not, I assume, expressed any opinion upon that particular subject, and it ought not to express any opinion upon it, because a judgment with regard to the propriety of rate increases would demand infinitely more information than Congress can possibly secure.

Mr. President, I apologize to the Senate for this long discussion of this matter. I hope it has somewhat cleared the atmosphere and that we shall all feel free to go forward and act upon this immensely important subject in accordance with the necessities of the country and the welfare of the people. If wage increases and rate increases are to be made in the near future, the President and the Director General of Railroads have abundant power to dispose of both those matters.

Mr. President, I ask the consent of the Senate to have printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks the letter of the Director General inclosed with the letter of the President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

JULY 31, 1919.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Several months ago the railroad shop employees asked for an increase in wages. The matter was considered by the Railroad Administration's board of wages and working conditions, which is composed of three representatives of labor and three representatives of the railroad managements. This board was unable to agree and therefore took no action as a board, but on July 16 I received two reports from members of the board, one from the three labor members recommending a general increase in wages (for example, increasing the wages of machinists from 68 cents per hour to 80 cents per hour and proportionately increasing the wages of other classes of shop employees), and another report from the three management members, recommending against any general increase in wages, although recommending certain readjustments of the wages of some classes of the employees.

The position of the labor members of the board is that the wages of railroad shopmen are substantially below the wages paid similar classes of employees in the navy yards, arsenals, and shipyards, and in many industrial enterprises in the principal cities of the country, and that substantial increases in the wages in the shipyards and outside industrial enterprises have taken place since the wages of the shop employees were established in the summer of 1918, and that the cost of living has been and is steadily rising. The position of the management members on the board is that the wages of shop employees are not properly comparable with the wages of nonrailroad employees cited by the employees and their representatives and that these latter industries have differentiating conditions which account for the high wages paid by them, and that a further wage increase at this time would simply begin a new cycle in the increased cost of living which would not benefit the employees. They urge instead the adoption of effective methods of reducing the cost of living, but they add that unless some action can be taken within a reasonable time to accomplish this result they see no alternative but to continue the wage cycle increases with corresponding increased cycles of living costs.

On July 28 a conference was begun, in accordance with an arrangement made on July 8, between the representatives of the Railroad Administration and representatives of the shop employees. At this conference the representatives of the employees made it plain to my associates that their members expected and believed that they were entitled to a substantial increase in wages retroactive to January 1, 1919, and that the state of unrest was so great that it was of the highest importance that a definite answer be given on the wage matter without delay. These representatives expressed the same views to me yesterday.

On July 17 the shop crafts convention, meeting at Atlanta, Ga., and representing employees from 16 railroads in the Southeast, strongly urged the necessity for substantial increases in wages by August 1, retroactive to January 1, 1919.

The earnest insistence that immediate action be taken to equalize wages with the rapid increase in the cost of living is not confined to the shop employees.

The triennial convention of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, representing about 160,000 railroad employees, meeting at Columbus, Ohio, adopted on May 31 a resolution strongly urging substantial additional increases in wages to meet the cost of living.

The triennial convention of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, meeting at Denver from June 9 to July 15, and representing about 116,000 employees, likewise adopted resolutions insisting upon the necessity for substantial increases in wages to meet the increased cost of living.

The thirteenth annual convention of Railway Signalmen of America, in session at Kansas City on July 15, strongly urged a further increase in wages, and similar action was taken at Boston on July 27 by 150 delegates to the convention of the United Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way Employees and Railroad Shop Employees of the railroad systems of New England and New York. The international convention of the Brotherhood of Railway Clerks, which was held in Cincinnati from May 12 to 24, indorsed proposals of the Railroad Administration, which also urged an increase and readjustment of the wages of the employees represented by that organization.

The representatives of the Railroad Administration have had assurances from representatives of practically all classes of employees that the continuance in the increase in the cost of living would necessarily involve very substantial increases in wages, and that increases in wages given to any one class of railroad employees would necessitate corresponding increases to all other classes of railroad employees.

The situation thus presented involves the following considerations:

We have received the most positive assurances that any general increases to shop employees will result in demands for corresponding increases to every other class of railroad employees. The situation therefore can not be viewed except as a whole for the entire 2,000,000 railroad employees. Viewing it as a whole, every increase of 1 cent per hour means an increase of $50,000,000 per year in operating expenses for straight time with a substantial addition for necessary overtime. An increase of 12 cents per hour, as asked for by the shop employees, would, if applied to all employees, mean (including necessary overtime) an increase of probably $800,000,000 per year in operating expenses.

The Government is already incurring a deficit at the rate of several hundred million dollars per year in operating the railroads, because the increase in transportation rates has been proportionately less than the increases in wages already granted and the increases in prices which have taken place. Therefore there is no fund whatever out of which additional wages can be paid, so that additional wages can not be paid unless new revenues are produced through an increase in transportation rates, and any immediate payment of additional wages would necessitate for several months an appropriation by Congress out of the Treasury, because substantial increases in rates could not be made immediately effective.

While you may find it expedient to use the temporary rate-making power, which was conferred upon you as a war emergency during Federal control, to prevent the continuance of the deficit now being incurred, which grows out of increases in wages and prices due to the war, you would not, in my opinion, be justified in regarding that rate-making power as a sufficient warrant for making still additional increases in rates for the purpose of paying still additional increases in wages to be established under existing peace conditions, and to be controlling as the wage basis in the future.

The question presented for an additional increase in wages, whether the total amount be $800,000,000 or any proportion of that sum, is a peace-time question between the entire American public, on the one hand, and the 2,000,000 railroad employees and the members of their families on the other hand. It is a question which I do not believe the Executive ought to undertake to decide unless specific authority is conferred upon him for the express purpose of deciding it.

The fact that these demands are made and are so urgently pressed emphasizes the great necessity of having for their decision legislation which will provide adequate machinery representing both the public and the employees. Obviously any such machinery should include a method whereby revenues will be provided to the extent required to pay the increased wages awarded.

While the general powers implied in the Federal control act were sufficient to admit of taking as war measures the necessary steps to deal with the wage problems that arose during the war, they are not sufficient to satisfy the requirements arising in connection with any present proposals for general wage increases. Under the existing machinery the ultimate public interest is exclusively represented by the Railroad Administration in the making of wages, but by the Interstate Commerce Commission in the final decision upon rates. Moreover, the Railroad Administration, while thus charged with the final decision as to what wages are proper as between the American public and railroad labor, is also charged with the responsibilities incident to the day-to-day operation of the roads. On the one hand, a decision by the Railroad Administration against an increase in wages will be regarded by the employees as a decision dictated more by the immediate difficulties of railroad management than by the broad interests of the public as a whole. On the other hand, a decision by the Railroad Administation in favor of an increase in wages will not necessarily be binding on the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is not the final representative of the public as to transportation rates. To deal with these problems under peace-time conditions there ought to be a final and authoritative representation of the public whose decision when in favor of a wage increase would carry with it the obligation on the part of the final rate-making power to prescribe rates which would furnish the necessary funds with which to pay the increased wages. It is obvious that no wage increases could be put into effect at the moment except on the theory that for several months they would be paid by an appropriation of Congress, because even under the existing machinery rate increases could not actually be put into effect for a substantial period. Undoubtedly any rate increases of a general character ought at the present time to be considered by the Interstate Commerce Commission before they shall be put into effect.

The conclusion to which I have come has been forced upon me by the recent developments above referred to.

When I announced last March the increases in wages for the employees in train and engine service I stated that they completed the war cycle of wage increases.

When it developed in May and June that the continued pressure of the increase in the cost of living was causing railroad employees generally to urge that they be given substantial protection through further important increases in wages if the cost of living was not reduced, I realized that the question was assuming such wide and deep significance to the American public, as well as to railroad employees, that the question ought not to be dealt with in the same way in which the railroad wages had been increased in connection with the war emergency. I therefore advised the Board of Railroad Wages and Working Conditions on July 3 that they could not regard themselves as vested with jurisdiction to formulate and recommend further general wage increases to be made by me, but that in all cases thereafter arising they should report the facts to me that I might decide in the light of the facts upon a fair and just procedure.

The receipt of the observations of the members of the board with reference to the shop employees, the hearings now in progress before the board with reference to the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, the conferences I have had in the last three days with the representatives of the shop employees, and the conferences which my associates and I have been having recently with the representatives of practically all classes of railroad labor with reference to the menace in the continued increase in the cost of living, force me to the definite conclusion that the problem is too great and has too much permanent significance to the American public, as well as to railroad labor, to admit of its being decided through the exercise of the war emergency powers of the Federal control act, and which are subject to the limitations and embarrassments above pointed out. I feel that the developments have now reached the point where the situation has taken a sufficiently concrete form to serve as the basis for a positive recommendation.

I therefore respectfully recommend that Congress be asked promptly to adopt legislation providing a properly constituted body on which the public and labor will be adequately represented and which will be empowered to pass on these and all railroad wage problems, but not on rules and working conditions, because the latter can not be satisfactorily separated from the current handling of railroad operations and therefore should continue to be dealt with by the Railroad Administration. Such legislation should also provide that if wage increases shall be decided upon it shall be mandatory upon the rate-making body to provide, where necessary, increased rates to take care of the resulting increases in the cost of operating the railroads.

I do not think that we can properly deal with this great problem without a full recognition of the fact that the cost of living is rapidly rising and that every month that passes promises to impair still further the purchasing power of the existing wages of railroad employees unless the rise in the cost of living can be successfully restrained, as I earnestly hope in the general public interest it can speedily be. I therefore further recommend that Congress be asked to provide in any such legislation that any increases in railroad wages which may be made by the tribunal constituted for that purpose shall be made effective as of August 1, 1919, to such extent as that tribunal may regard reasonable and proper in order to give railroad employees from that date the benefit which the tribunal may think they were then entitled to. In this way the delay necessarily incident to the creation of such tribunal and its action will not be prejudicial to the fair interests of the railroad employees.

Cordially, yours, WALKER D. HINES.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I should like to make one suggestion in reply to the question of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

Let us understand that it is not permanent legislation which the President is asking us to enact. He deems that there is a temporary condition, a demand for increased wages, and that the railroad revenues are not sufficient even to pay the increases which have already been granted. What is the nature of the request the Director General of Railroads—for I do not think the President is concerned about it—is making of the Congress? It is that the Congress temporarily authorize a board to consider and recommend an increase in wages received by railroad employees. This legislation is temporarily intended to meet what is termed a great emergency, and, of course, the President or the Director General will appoint the board. Does it not seem unusual that the Congress should be asked to enact a law to enable the President to appoint a board to consider the wage question when he already has that power? The Congress has given him the most absolute power on that subject, and, moreover, he has exercised it. Pursuant to the power given him under the railroad act of 1918, the Director General appointed a wage board, consisting of Franklin K. Lane, Mr. McChord of the Interstate Commerce Commission, Judge Covington, and William R. Willcox. With their experts and employees, they spent about three months investigating questions relating to wages, including the increase in living expenses, and on April 30, 1918, submitted a very exhaustive and able report covering some hundreds of pages. I have read the report. It is very comprehensive. It recommended an increase approximating $300,000,000 in the wages of the railroad employees. The Director General then, I understand, appointed a wage board in his organization to have jurisdiction of all questions relating to increases in the wage scale, and from that time to this increases have been made, until they now aggregate about a billion dollars.

Of course, it is a matter of the greatest interest to Congress, because, without discussing the merits of their demands, for I have neither the knowledge nor the time to do that, with the present operating expenses and increased income under advanced rates, many of the leading first-class railroads to-day are not earning the interest on their bonds, and the bonds represent but a small percentage of the value of their property.

The Pennsylvania Railroad did not earn last year within $31,000,000 of its moderate dividend requirements. The Milwaukee road is not earning a cent on its bonds, and many other leading railroads that have paid dividends for many years are not earning more than the interest on their bonds. Naturally it is of interest to the Congress. But the director general, as stated by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], is charged with the duty of establishing wage scales and initiating rates to meet them during the time the Government has control and is operating the lines of railroad. He can not shirk that responsibility, although I am perfectly willing to assume my share of it.

The Congress was not called in extra session until the 19th of May, and we know that the time until the 1st of July was mostly taken up with appropriation bills. The members of the Committee on Interstate Commerce will confirm my statement that that committee has worked industriously on the most tremendous economic problem ever submitted to any Congress in the history of this country.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KELLOGG. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. As I understand, the President is asking that we provide by legislation for a commission to study this compensation question?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. May it not be true that he feels that the length of time he will control the roads will be short now, and that it is better that the board which studies the question be authorized by us in order that it may be a continuing board, rather than one simply temporary, appointed by him now?

Mr. KELLOGG. The fact is that there is no suggestion, as I understand, that this should be a continuing board. Who would make the appointments?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The members of the board would be appointed as we might provide. I am in no sense in the President's confidence. I am merely asking the question as a Senator who has felt that we might previously have carried responsibilities that were not yielded to us and who is disposed to help carry any when we have an opportunity so to do.

Mr. KELLOGG. Of course, the most we could do would be to authorize the President to appoint a board. He would select the board. We would not study the wage question. I believe that it would take Congress many months to gather the information and to go into all the details of the wage question, if it should attempt to do that. The Congress would not fix any wages. The board would study the question, and the board would make recommendations to the President and the President would fix the wages.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Would not the board be appointed upon the idea that in considering the question of wages we must have detailed information, and is it not a question that necessarily confronts us in the near future in connection with the problem of freight rates?

Mr. KELLOGG. I am very willing that Congress should study that question.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If that is so, is it not for the benefit of the country that this board be created by statute rather than by a temporary board appointed by the President during his temporary power?

Mr. KELLOGG. There is not any suggestion that it should be a permanent board, and, furthermore, the board has not been asked for by the Director General to study the wage question for the benefit of Congress but for the benefit of the Director General in assisting him to make the rates. The Director General, acting under the President, now has the power to appoint such a board. The President and the Director General have all the power that we could possibly give them. The President asks that the wages, when fixed by the board, shall be binding and mandatory upon the Interstate Commerce Commission. That is the only distinction between the power now existing and the power asked for by the President.

I do not contend that Congress should not comply. I wish simply to correct any misapprehension, since the President and Director General are not compelled to ask Congress for power to increase wages and advance rates. The absolute power now exists; it has been exercised; a board has been appointed which has considered the wage question, submitting a report to the Director General, and on it the Director General acted in the first instance, subsequently appointing a board of his own, which has vastly increased wages.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes.

Mr. KING. This thought suggests itself to me, and I ask the Senator's opinion about it, not in any controversial way: It is obvious that any increase in wages will constitute a burden upon the railroads, a lien.

Mr. KELLOGG. Oh, certainly.

Mr. KING. Pro tanto it is a confiscation of the property. Now that the war is over, does the Senator think the President and perhaps Congress would have the power to pass a law which in its character is rather confiscatory without making provision for compensation?

Mr. KELLOGG. Of course, Congress can not pass any law that adds to the operating expenses of a railroad, so as to confiscate its property, without at the same time providing for an increase of income to meet it. That, of course, I think must be admitted.

Mr. KING. It is clear, as I understand the figures which have been given this morning, that the burdens which have been imposed upon the roads by the Railroad Administration have been far greater than have been recouped from the public by the increase in rates, and to that extent it has placed a burden upon the railroads which is in part confiscatory.

Mr. KELLOGG. Well, it would be confiscatory if the burden was not temporarily sustained by the Government. Of course if the railroads were to be returned to-day, with their present operating expenses fixed, which undoubtedly constitute a charge ahead of their mortgages, half the railroads in the United States would be in the hands of receivers in 60 days. They could not survive, of course. Everyone admits it; the Director General does not deny it, and he has not the courage to remedy it. That is the trouble, just as the Senator from Ohio said.

I showed the other day in the Senate that there were 140,000 more employees in January, 1919, doing less work, handling less freight, than there were in December, 1917, the last month of private operation; and we are paying those 140,000 employees $210,000,000 a year, which is more than 3 per cent on every dollar of railroad capital stock in the United States. Now, I do not say that the Director General is to blame for that. Undoubtedly a very large part of that is due to shorter hours; but the fact confronts us that in spite of the increase in freight rates the operating expenses have advanced much more rapidly, and the railroads to-day could not live—nobody denies it—on the income the Director General is receiving.

The railroads must be maintained in some way; and there is before this committee, as I said, and before this Congress, the most difficult economic problem that we have ever encountered. I know it is not good taste to say, "I told you so," but I warned the Senate when the Government took over the railroads that this condition would confront the American people. There never was a Government operation that was not wasteful and inefficient. It is inevitable under our organization that it should be so. It is not the province or the prerogative of a democracy like ours, instituted for the best Government on the face of the earth, to manage the business of the country.

We have this problem to settle. I feel the responsibility, as we all do. I am willing, and I shall give the President's recommendation the most serious consideration, and I do not say that I shall not favor that action. I do say that he has the power now, and that the responsibility of handling this $18,000,000,000 of property has been placed upon the Railroad Administration, and it can not shirk that responsibility, for which it is answerable to the American people.

CONSERVATION OF FOOD PRODUCTS.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I notice in the papers of the last few days that the administration, and particularly the Attorney General, are quoted as stating that they are endeavoring to discover means by which to stop profiteering in food or other essentials of life that go toward the cost of living, and that investigation and action with a view of a reduction of the cost of living are being contemplated by them; and in that connection it is stated that they expect to ask Congress to enact such legislation to enable them to act.

In that connection, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD section 26 of the act of Congress approved August 10, 1917. It is a bill which I had the honor of introducing, which was reported out of the Committee on the Judiciary, and was incorporated in the act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

It will be seen by any lawyer from reading this clause, I believe, that if the reports which we are constantly reading in the newspapers are true that vast quantities of perishable foodstuffs, meat products, fish, poultry, eggs, fruit, and vegetables are stored for long periods of time, in quantities which seem to be astoundingly large, it would be susceptible of proof that this procedure could be for no other purpose than limiting the supply of these things to the public and of enhancing the market price of them; and those are the things which are prohibited by this penal statute, under a penalty of a fine of not more than $5,000 or imprisonment for not more than two years.

I recommend this to the attention of the Attorney General of the United States and his assistants, with the inquiry as to whether or not this legislation already on the statute books is not sufficient to enable him to accomplish the purpose which he is proclaiming.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Without objection, the request of the Senator from Washington will be complied with.

The matter referred to is as follows:

SEC. 26. That any person carrying on or employed in commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, or with or in the Territories or other possessions of the United States in any article suitable for human food, fuel, or other necessaries of life, who, either in his individual capacity or as an officer, agent, or employee of a corporation or member of a partnership carrying on or employed in such trade, shall store, acquire, or hold, or who shall destroy or make away with any such article for the purpose of limiting the supply thereof to the public or affecting the market price thereof in such commerce, whether temporarily or otherwise, shall be deemed guilty of a felony and, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both: Provided, That any storing or holding by any farmer, gardner, or other person of the products of any farm, garden, or other land cultivated by him shall not be deemed to be a storing or holding within the meaning of this act: Provided further, That farmers and fruit growers, cooperative and other exchanges, or societies of a similar character shall not be included within the provisions of this section: Provided further, That this section shall not be construed to prohibit the holding or accumulating of any such article by any such person in a quantity not in excess of the reasonable requirements of his business for a reasonable time or in a quantity reasonably required to furnish said articles produced in surplus quantities seasonally throughout the period of scant or no production. Nothing contained in this section shall be construed to repeal the act entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890, commonly known as the Sherman Antitrust Act. (From Public Act No. 41, 65th Congress, approved Aug. 10, 1917.)

TREATY WITH FRANCE.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I offer a Senate resolution and ask that it be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 154), as follows:

Whereas doubts have been expressed as to the authority of the treaty-making power, under the Constitution, to enter into the treaty with France, submitted to the Senate for ratification on the 29th day of July, 1919: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and it hereby is, requested to inquire and advise the Senate whether there are any constitutional obstacles to the making of the said treaty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will go over under the rule and be printed.

ACTIVITIES OF OFFICIALS FOR LEGISLATION.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, yesterday morning's Washington Post contains an article headed "Chief Stone, of Engineers, announces labor's plans of campaign for relief."

A part of the article is as follows:

Warren S. Stone, grand chief of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, announced last night that Edward Keating, former Member of Congress from Colorado, would begin work to-day as business manager of the Plumb plan, which provides perpetual Government ownership and operation of the railroad systems of the country.

And so forth.

Mr. President, Mr. Edward Keating is a member of a commission created by Congress for the purpose of equalizing the salaries of Government employees. An appropriation of $25,000 was first made for that commission. Later an appropriation of $65,000 was made; and I might say in passing the commission was, in my opinion, created for the very purpose of taking care of three ex-Members of Congress.

Be that as it may, a commission was created, the three ex-Members were appointed, and Mr. Edward Keating was appointed a member of the commission. I can not see, Mr. President, why he now, receiving the same salary from the Government that he received as a Congressman, should be appointed by Chief Stone, of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, to work for that organization or any other organization. I protest against it, Mr. President, and I say that there are men in the United States who can do the work just as well as Mr. Keating could do it, and as long as Mr. Keating is drawing $7,500 per annum from the Government of the United States for specific work that will take him every minute of his time for many and many a month yet before that work is concluded, to accept employment from some other source outside is wrong.

I might add, Mr. President, that I also noticed in the paper the other day that a national market body has been formed, and that Mr. Kent, of the Tariff Commission, has been appointed president of it. The paper announces what that board is formed for. Yet we are paying Mr. Kent as a member of the Tariff Commission $7,500 per annum. It does seem to me that that sort of business ought to stop.

In this connection I want to ask that the two articles be printed, showing just what the new duties of these men are to be, and just how their appointments came about, and for what purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Washington Star, July 25, 1919.]

NATIONAL MARKET BODY IS FORMED—PRODUCERS AND CONSUMERS ORGANIZE TO OBTAIN REGULATION OF PACKERS—HAS HEADQUARTERS HERE.

Producers and consumers have formed a national marketing committee to aid in the effort to obtain Federal regulation of the packers. Headquarters have been established in the Bliss Building here. Former Representative William Kent, of California, is president of the committee.

The other officers are C. H Gustafson, chairman of the farmers' national committee on packing plants and allied industries; Mrs. Florence Kelley, secretary of the National Consumers' League; Mrs. E. P. Costigan, chairman of the legislative committee of the Consumers' League of the District of Columbia; and Herbert F. Baker, president of the Farmers' National Council, all as vice presidents of the committee. Jackson H. Ralston, of Washington, counsel for the American Federation of Labor, is chief counsel; George P. Hampton, managing director of the Farmers' National Council, is chairman of the executive board.

MR. KENT DISCUSSES PLAN.

"The Farmers' National Council, through the farmers' national committee on packing plants and allied industries, of which I was a charter member, has since the report of the Federal Trade Commission on the meat-packing industry conducted a very effective educational campaign for that report," Mr. Kent said to-day.

"The council, with representatives of leading labor and consumers' organizations, have decided that the best way to bring the public sentiment of the country to bear on Congress for the enactment of the Kenyon-Anderson bill and similar measures to improve marketing conditions is through a national marketing committee. On behalf of the organizations I have been asked to accept the presidency of the national marketing committee, which I am very glad to do, as I realize the food question is the most important one before the American people to-day. The committee has established headquarters in the Bliss Building, Washington, D. C., and is a national organization, in which all forces to improve marketing can unite to secure a better system of distribution of food and food products.

STATES PURPOSE AND PROGRAM

"The committee's immediate purpose is to secure the enactment of the Kenyon-Anderson bill to carry out the recommendations of the Federal Trade Commission regarding the meat packing and allied industries in the most practical way.

"The committee's program includes:

"First. A nation-wide campaign for the Kenyon-Anderson bill.

"Second. To create an enlightened public opinion concerning the waste and unnecessary expense in handling and distributing farm products and to assist in bringing before the country the information secured by the Federal Bureau of Markets and other national and State agencies.

"Third. To promote and foster proper marketing organizations and methods; to encourage and secure the standardization of agricultural products; to secure proper warehouse systems; to promote expert marketing services in the several States; to secure uniformity in methods by States in inaugurating investigation and demonstration work in marketing; and to secure changes in Federal and State laws to these ends.

SAYS SENTIMENT NEEDS ORGANIZATION.

"We start with a splendid background of popular sentiment, which merely needs to be organized. The recommendations of the Federal Trade Commission have been indorsed by the leading farm, labor, consumers, and civic organizations of the country.

"The national marketing committee will unite, organize, and make effective the nation-wide demand for the bill to make the Federal Trade Commission's recommendations regarding the meat-packing industry our permanent national policy."

CHIEF STONE, OF ENGINEERS, ANNOUNCES LABOR'S PLANS OF CAMPAIGN FOR RELIEF.

Warren S. Stone, grand chief of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, announced last night that Edward Keating, former Member of Congress from Colorado, would begin work to-day as business manager of the Plumb plan, which provides perpetual Government ownership and operation of the railroad systems of the country.

"From all parts of the country," said Mr. Stone last night, "we have received reports indorsing the movement. We have heard not only from railroad workers, but from men and women in practically every walk of life."

LABOR TO PUSH PLUMB PLAN.

Mr. Stone also declared that the same interest was manifest in the action of the railroad brotherhoods in bringing the attention of the President to the high cost of living.

Before the week is out it is expected that the indorsement given the Plumb plan by the railroad workers will be followed by similar action on the part of the other great labor organizations of the country.

The railroad brotherhoods will maintain representatives in Washington from now on to watch the progress of the bill embodying the Plumb plan, introduced in the House yesterday by Representative SIMS. A "show-down" is expected shortly, as both House and Senate committees are now formulating legislation in preparation for the return of the roads to their private owners, and the Plumb plan will run afoul of this legislation as soon as it reaches the committees. A measure similar to the Sims bill is expected to be introduced in the Senate either to-day or to-morrow.

DIRECT TO THE PEOPLE.

Mr. Stone said that the brotherhoods intended to carry their fight direct to the people without waiting to see what action Congress would take. "Within 90 days," he declared, "Congress will have heard from 1,000,000 of the people, and as time goes on it will hear from more. I don't like to make statements which might be considered rabid, but if the roads are returned to private owners, the majority of them will be in the hands of receivers within 60 days."

It was announced last night that Mr. Stone, Frank Morrison, secretary of the American Federation of Labor, and Glenn E. Plumb, author of the Plumb plan, would appear before a joint committee of the Senate and House Wednesday to explain the plan in detail.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I wish to ask a question of the Senator from Utah. I am quite in accord with the Senator's expressions of opinion regarding the substance of the article offered. I wanted to ask whether his strictures are not equally appropriate to employees of the Government who have been selected by the employees' associations to lobby with Congressmen, both in the House and in the Senate, for legislation favorable to them. Does the Senator know whether these employees are drawing their salaries from the Government, ostensibly for service rendered, and at the same time performing the duties assigned to them in connection with their so-called legislative positions?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no question but what many are drawing their salaries right along, and no question but what calls are made nearly every day, either upon Representatives or Senators, in relation to legislation in which the callers are interested, and using every power that they have at their command to force, if I may use that word——

Mr. THOMAS. That is the right word to use.

Mr. SMOOT. Calls are made upon Representatives and Senators to vote for the measures they are interested in. The time has come when it ought to cease. As long as the Government is paying the salaries I have named, the time of those men ought to be given to the service of the Government, and not divided. Not only that, their time is given for the purpose of forcing through Congress legislation, and I think it is a very unwise practice and ought to cease.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr NEW. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Gronna	Myers	Smith, Ariz.
Brandegee	Harding	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Capper	Harris	New	Smoot
Chamberlain	Henderson	Newberry	Sterling
Cummins	Hitchcock	Norris	Sutherland
Curtis	Johnson, S. Dak.	Nugent	Swanson
Dial	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Thomas
Dillingham	Kellogg	Page	Trammell
Elkins	Kenyon	Phelan	Underwood
Fall	King	Phipps	Wadsworth
Fernald	La Follette	Pittman	Watson
Fletcher	Lenroot	Poindexter	Williams
France	McKellar	Sheppard	Wolcott
Gay	McNary	Simmons

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], and the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] are detained on public business.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to announce that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] are detained on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present.

PEACE TREATY AND JAPANESE INTERESTS IN CHINA.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, some days ago I served notice that at this time I would address the Senate upon the relations existing between China and Japan, particularly those having reference to Shantung arising out of three articles in the treaty of peace. Had it not been for that notice thus given, I should not have intruded myself upon the deliberations of the Senate at this time to make a speech upon the subject, for the Senate to-day has been occupied by the consideration of a domestic problem that I think in importance transcends even that involved in the league of nations, great as that is, portentous as it promises to be. I believe that the Senate of the United States might well give primary attention to the very great problems which at this time confront and perplex us as a people within our own borders; but inasmuch as I gave notice that I would speak upon that subject I shall proceed.

Mr. President, three questions present themselves for discussion with reference to the Japanese possession of Shantung:

First. What rights has she there?

Second. Does she intend to relinquish whatever rights she has if we ratify the pending treaty?

Third. Ought we to ratify it with the Shantung provision in it, unless, previous to our action, Japan shall either withdraw from that Province or else fix a definite date when she will?

JAPAN'S RIGHTS IN SHANTUNG.

Senators, in the beginning of the year 1897 Shantung was a Province of China and her title to it was undisputed. In the latter part of that year two German missionaries were murdered there, and under the pretense of seeking reparation for this wrong Germany, anxious for a stronger foothold in the Far East, demanded of China certain concessions in the Province of Shantung. Prince Henry, a brother of the Kaiser, appeared in Kiaochow Bay with a fleet of battleships to enforce the demand. China was compelled to yield, and on the 6th day of March, 1898, entered into an agreement with Germany by the terms of which she leased to that ambitious country for 99 years certain rights in Kiaochow Bay and the environs. This was done presumably for government, but in reality for exploitation. This territory was wrenched from China by sheer force, without any pretense of right or basis of justice, and thus affords a most striking example of Germany's iron rule that might makes right, one that we trust will never again be invoked on earth.

Much stress has been laid on the fact that Germany acquired by lease an interest in a very limited territory of Shantung, but the principle involved is the same, whether it be small or great; and Senators who make this assertion overlook two material facts: First, the economic value of the concessions that Germany received, and, second, the three supplemental treaties forced from China by Germany with reference to Shantung and signed in 1899, 1900, and 1905, by virtue of which she enlarged her rights, extended her authority, and took virtual economic control of the entire Province of Shantung; and certainly no one will have the hardihood to deny that the economic control of a Province and population of that character means its political control.

By the treaty of March 6, 1898, Germany acquired full control of the Bay of Kiaochow and a zone of 50 kilometers surrounding it, Chiposan and Potato Island, all islands lying seaward from Kiaochow Bay which may be of importance for its defense, such as Tolosan and Chalienchou.

It is specifically stipulated that—

> The Chinese population dwelling in the ceded territories shall at all times enjoy the protection of the German Government, provided that they behave in conformity with law and order; unless their lands are required for other purposes, they may remain there.

In addition, the Chinese Government sanctions the construction by Germany of two lines of railway running through the Province of Shantung, and likewise agreed to allow German subjects to hold and develop mining property for a distance of 10 miles on each side of both of these railways and along the whole length of the lines.

And in order to convince the most obdurate that Germany took complete economic possession of Shantung I cite this stipulation:

> The Chinese Government binds itself in all cases where assistance, in persons, capital, or material, may be needed for any purpose whatever within the Province of Shantung, to offer the said work or supplying of material in the first instance to German manufacturers and merchants engaged in undertakings of the kind in question.

That, I submit, is a complete answer to the proposition that China conceded nothing to Germany save certain limited rights in Kiaochow Bay and environments.

In a country of the limited means of Shantung, where so much foreign capital is required for any work of an extensive character, this meant the full economic and commercial control by Germany, and all of these rights and privileges were seized by Japan when she dispossessed Germany, and that is why that particular feature of the treaty is of supreme importance in our deliberations.

JAPAN IN KIAOCHOW.

In 1914 China wanted to declare war against Germany and offered to take Kiaochow from their possession. Japan alone interfered to prevent it, and this fact should have a most important bearing in determining Japan's intention with reference to Kiaochow. Replying to the request of Great Britain and France that Japan should permit China to enter the war, Ishii, then minister of foreign affairs, replied that—

> Japan can not view without apprehension the moral awakening of 400,000,000 people in the event of China entering the war.

If my contention is correct, as I think I shall be able to prove, Japan would not permit China to take this step because her rulers had her future course clearly outlined in thought, a course they have since relentlessly pursued, and which they intend to pursue to the end.

Twenty-two days after Germany declared war on Russia, and 19 days after England declared war on Germany, Japan entered the contest against the Kaiser. Her first act after this declaration was to issue a demand on Germany for the surrender of her Chinese possessions. This demand specifically stated that "the occupied territory will be returned to China," and, if Japan be in good faith, this constitutes a part of her contract with the nations now involved in the peace treaty; either that or else it is a further illustration of the deception she has practiced from the beginning of this transaction to the present hour.

The Allies would not permit her to take possession of Kiaochow without the presence of English troops. While the Japanese in this expedition outnumbered the English, yet the English furnished the military skill necessary to the successful execution of their purpose in short order, and Tsing-tao was captured. Thereafter English troops went to another quarter of the globe to fight, while the Japanese remained in China to make fast their prize.

JAPAN IN SHANTUNG.

Senators lay much stress on the narrow strip thus taken by Japan, but they forget that immediately after Japan took possession of Kiaochow, against the protest of China, she sent a large force of soldiers entirely through the Province of Shantung, took possession of railroads and mines, established post offices, stationed and left garrisons in many of the most important towns of that Province, all of which arrangements have not since been disturbed, all of them made without any pretense of right, all of them made while the other nations were engaged in war and could not protest, all of them clearly showing Japan's intention to take the whole of Shantung, of which she now has complete military and economic possession, which purpose she will execute unless retarded by the moral power of the world.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President will the Senator yield?

Mr. WATSON. With pleasure.

Mr. NORRIS. May I call attention to the fact that in this combined attack on the Germans by the Japanese and the English, it was not necessary for them to go onto any territory that was neutral and the English Government observed that with her soldiers, but Japan went across the same as Germany went across Belgium, a neutral strip of about 150 miles of territory, in making this combined attack.

Mr. WATSON. Yes; and commandeered her subsistence all the way across.

Mr. NORRIS. She did with China exactly what Germany did with Belgium.

Mr. WATSON. Precisely. I thank the Senator for his contribution.

It is not possible that there is a person in all the world that will hold that Germany's possessions in Shantung were other than wrong, because obtained at the mouth of the cannon and secured under military duress. What, then, did Japan acquire when she ousted Germany and succeeded to that country's rights in Shantung? Evidently Germany's wrongful possession, which was the result of a lease obtained by duress. Is there any denying this plain fact?

If that be true, what validity can this title thus obtained have in any court in civilization? Every lawyer understands that a contract obtained by duress is voidable at the option of the wronged party, and there is no doubt that this rule applied to Germany, as it would now apply to Japan's rights in Shantung if she had any. Germany took and held it by military power. Japan took and now holds it by military power, and China has at no time been able to void the contract, though she would have been perfectly justified in so doing. If Japan received from the peace conference the rights of Germany in Shantung, she merely received Germany's wrongful possession based on Germany's voidable lease. She could not have possibly received more, for Germany had no more to give.

Now, Japan herself was not satisfied with her title in Shantung and therefore sought to strengthen it by a treaty made with England, France, Russia, and Italy in 1917. In the letter of the British Embassy to the Japanese minister of foreign affairs, under date of February 16, 1916, the following statement is made, and I call attention to the specific statement, because it has to do with the right Japan acquired by the treaty of Japan if it be she acquired any:

His Britannic Majesty's Government accedes with pleasure to the request of the Japanese Government for an assurance—that they will support Japan's claims in regard to the disposal of German rights in Shantung.

It will thus be seen that all that England agreed to was to "support Japan's claims" to "Germany's rights in Shantung." This was later accepted by the Japanese and therefore constituted a contract between the two countries.

This simply meant that Germany's rights in Shantung should go to Japan and not to China, their rightful owner. England knew and Japan knew that if China declared war against Germany all of Japan's holdings in Shantung would revert at once to China, for so far as those rights were concerned Japan simply stood in Germany's place; and knowing this and seeking to escape from it, they made a new treaty based wholly upon power and depending for its execution upon their ability to enforce it. This was in direct violation of Japan's agreement under the terms of Japan's demands on Germany when she declared war and in direct violation of Premier Okuma's declaration of intention issued to the United States in 1914.

JAPAN AND FRANCE.

Later on the Japanese minister addressed the French ambassador at Tokyo and stated: "The Imperial Japanese Government proposes to get from Germany at the time of the peace negotiations the surrender of the territorial rights and special interests Germany possessed before the war in Shantung." Once more Japan demanded nothing more than the "rights that Germany possessed before the war in Shantung." To this the French acceded, but stated as one of the conditions of the acceptance: "Fourth, forfeiting the rights of Germany in the concessions she possesses in certain parts of China."

The fourth concession demanded by France of Japan in consideration of granting to Japan what she wanted. By these agreements France, as did England, promised to support nothing more than Japan's claims to Germany's interests in Shantung. Did these countries agree to give Japan greater rights in China than Germany had before the war? Did they agree to anything more than that Japan should succeed Germany in whatever rights Germany might have had in Shantung? Did they anywhere agree to give to Japan a fee-simple title instead of a leasehold? Was there any agreement asked or made that these nations would compel China to give Japan something more than Germany had? The language in each case is clear and unmistakable and amounts to nothing more than an agreement on the part of each nation to support the claims of Japan to the rights that Germany had in Shantung before the war.

And it is of especial significance that France, evidently understanding the inevitable effect of a declaration of war by China, which she demanded in her agreement with Japan, insisted that such declaration of war should mean "forfeiting the rights of Germany in the concessions she possesses in certain parts of China." By this she did not mean forfeiting the rights of all the concessions in Germany, for the very object of that agreement was to transfer certain concessions of Germany in China to Japan, but it did mean that the general effect of the declaration of war by China against Germany would be the cancellation, ipso facto, of all the other German concessions in China.

My contention is that when Japan entered China in 1914 she did not believe that that country would ever engage in the war; that she intended to demand of Germany at the close of the war her rights to Shantung; that, understanding that she herself would have no title to anything of value if China declared war against Germany, she declined to give her consent to such a declaration, and even threatened to invade China with her troops if she made it; that, believing that her claim to the permanent possession of Shantung would not be supported at the peace conference unless based upon something stronger than the mere fact that she had dislodged Germany from Shantung, she determined to seek another basis of agreement and lay deeper foundations for a claim to rights in that Province, based not on her dispossession of Germany but on a hard-and-fast agreement with the Allies, who would have the power to insert it in the articles of peace and the subsequent power to help Japan enforce it. Therefore it can not be denied that, had nothing occurred between Japan and China after Japan took possession of Shantung, had the treaty of 1915 not been made between them, and had she not made her secret treaty with the Allies in 1917, and had not China entered the war, all that Japan could have demanded at the peace conference were the rights that Germany held in Shantung before the war, rights to which Japan succeeded by conquest.

CHINA'S DECLARATION OF WAR.

But, Senators, the whole situation changed when China declared war on Germany. What effect did that have on Germany's title to all she claimed in Shantung? Can there be any doubt that the title to everything that Germany claimed in China reverted at once to that country by the very act of the declaration of war? Let us suppose that German war vessels had been riding at anchor in Kiaochow Bay at the time of the declaration. Is there anyone so bold as to say that China could not have seized and converted these to her own use and that they would not have become her own property? And if that be true of a battleship, owned by the German Government, why is it not true of a fort owned by the same Government? Why was it not true as to all of the rights of the German Government in China? Those rights, by the very declaration of war between the two countries, reverted immediately to China. In legal contemplation, in my judgment, it was China's option to void a voidable contract by which all the rights taken from her by Germany under the contract immediately reverted to her, having been obtained under duress.

It is a fact of tremendous significance that China, in her declaration of war against Germany, expressly stated that all existing treaties between China and Germany were abrogated. allied and associated powers, including the United States and This declaration was taken cognizance of and confirmed by the Japan, both of which nations replied in identic notes and assured China of their "solidarity of friendship and support."

THE AGREEMENT OF 1915.

But it has been argued that Japan's rights in Shantung were ripened by a treaty made between Japan and China in 1915, and that China is now estopped to deny the validity of the Japanese claim not only to Germany's rights in Shantung but also to other rights acquired by the treaty of 1915 itself.

Let us examine the provisions of this treaty with some care in order to ascertain precisely what rights Japan acquired under it. The one most generally relied upon by the defenders of Japan reads as follows:

The Chinese Government agrees that when the Japanese Government hereafter approaches the German Government for the transfer of all rights and whatever privileges of whatsoever nature enjoyed by Germany in the Province of Shantung, whether secured by treaty or in any other manner, China will give her full assent thereto.

I ask you to remember in the discussion of this phase of the problem that that was before China entered the war and before the rights of Germany in Shantung had reverted to China by reason of China's declaration of war against Germany.

Furthermore, that declaration was obtained by force from China, for the Japanese Government issued an ultimatum to China in which she stated that if her demands were not immediately acceded to she should take whatever steps were necessary to enforce them. This was at a time when all the other nations were at war, when China was helpless and Japan powerful, and the Japanese took advantage of this situation to wring from helpless China a treaty of this character.

But what does Japan acquire under its terms? Passing over for the moment the fact that it was obtained by duress and was therefore invalid, it certainly conferred no present rights upon Japan, for it expressly recites that when "hereafter" the Japanese Government approaches the German Government and demands further privileges, China will agree, thus forcing from China a promise to agree to whatever arrangement Japan may make with Germany "hereafter" with reference to Germany's possessions in Shantung. The character of this agreement, Senators, and its very wording show how manifestly unfair it was and how it compelled China by sheer force to agree to any future arrangement Germany and Japan might make respecting Chinese territory, but it conferred no "present" right upon China, no right immediately enforceable, but one having reference only to future action.

This was in 1915, many months after Japan had taken Kiaochow. If she thought her title sufficient, if she deemed that, having dispossessed Germany of her rights in Shantung, she had the right to hold indefinitely what she then had, why did she think it was necessary to enter into an agreement with China by which she forced her consent subsequently to perfect her title?

At that time China had not declared war, and Japan did not believe that she ever would declare war. Japan believed that when the war was over she would be able to approach Germany and make the demand herein set forth; but the declaration of war by China changed the entire status, for it left Germany without any rights in China of which Japan could demand possession. Japan never "approached Germany" under the terms of that provision. So far as that contract was concerned, there was no "hereafter," and so far as Germany's title to possessions in Shantung was concerned, it vanished with China's declaration of war, and therefore there was nothing that Japan could demand of Germany in accordance with the article above mentioned at the conclusion of the war. Japan herself understood this, for, when it became evident that China was going to get into the war, she did not rely upon either her dispossession of Germany in 1914 or her treaty of 1915 for her future rights in China, but hastened to make a specific agreement with reference to them with the nations that she knew would be at the peace table and that by their military power would be able to enforce her demands, and that is what she relies on at this hour.

JAPAN'S INTENTIONS.

In the light of her past record, does anyone believe that Japan intends to relinquish whatever rights she has in China? When she went into Formosa she promised to retire, but she is still there. When she went into Korea she promised to retire, but she is still there. When she made her demand on Germany for the surrender of her possessions in Shantung she promised to hand them over to China, but she still has them. Count Okuma, the Japanese premier, on October 27, 1914, stated to the people of the United States, "As premier of Japan, I have stated and now again state to the people of America and of all the world that Japan has no ulterior motive, no desire to secure more territory, no thought of depriving China or other peoples of anything they now possess," but Japan is still there.

THE TREATY OF 1915.

On the 18th of January, 1915, without any previous warning, growing out of no unusual conditions between the two countries, and to the utter surprise of the Chinese, Japan issued to her a demand couched in 5 groups and 21 clauses. Group 1 has reference to Shantung. In addition to the rights Japan had taken from Germany in Shantung, she demanded that the Chinese Government "should not within the Province of Shantung and along its coast cede or lease to a third power under any pretext any of its territory or any of its islands," thus laying the foundation for the future control of that Province. She further exacted the right to "build a railway from Chefoo, or Lungkow, to join the Kiaochow-Tsinanfu Railway," thus conferring on her the right to construct three railways in Shantung, she having succeeded to the German right to build two.

The second group had reference to Japanese control of South Manchuria and Eastern Inner Mongolia.

The third group referred to the Hanyehping Co.

Group IV provided:

The Chinese Government engages not to cede or lease to a third power any harbor or bay or island along the coast of China.

Group V of the original 21 articles was so drastic and far-reaching that not only China but other countries became alarmed at the extent of the power demanded by Japan, and many protests were lodged against its acceptance, while China herself declined to yield. This group was afterwards made a subject of the exchange of notes and so stands to this day without ever having been finally concluded, and is evidently one of the demands that Japan intends to insist on consummating if this treaty is ratified and she has the power.

JAPAN'S REVISED DEMANDS.

On the 26th of April, 1915, Japan withdrew her 21 demands and in their place substituted 24 in four groups. Group I has reference to Shantung and gives Japan practically control of that Province.

Group II has reference to South Manchuria and Eastern Inner Mongolia. As an evidence of the arbitrary manner in which Japan exacted these concessions from China, permit me to call the attention of the Senate to Group II of the revised demands, in a supplementary exchange of notes. It is as follows:

The term of lease of Port Arthur and Dalny shall expire in the eighty-sixth year of the Republic, or 1997. The date for restoring the South Manchurian Railway to China shall fall due in the ninety-first year of the Republic, or 2002. Article 12 in the original South Manchurian Railway agreement, that it may be redeemed by China after 36 years after the traffic is opened, is hereby canceled. The terms of the Antung-Mukden Railway shall expire in the ninety-sixth year of the Republic, or 2007.

Can anyone see in this any indication on the part of Japan of retiring from the control of the Chinese Empire? Does it not rather enforce the idea that she is there to remain?

In this connection it is worthy of note that Japan now controls the railroad from Tsingtau to Tsinanfu, the capital of Shantung, 250 miles in length; that she controls the railway from Tsinanfu to Peking, the capital of the Chinese Empire; that she has the right to construct another to Cheefoo, a principal seaport of Shantung; that she controls all the railway systems of South Manchuria; that she has established a scheme of preferred traffic on these lines by which Japanese commerce is carried at a less rate than either Chinese goods or the wares of any other nation, and that, by all these means she intends to obtain complete control of the commerce of the Chinese Republic.

Another article reads as follows:

The Chinese Government agrees that Japanese subjects shall be permitted forthwith to investigate, select, and then prospect for and open mines in the following places in South Manchuria, apart from those mining areas in which mines are now being prospected for or worked.

And then follows a list of places that those familiar with the mineral wealth of the country inform me embrace the principal mining regions of that Province.

Another article provides:

The Chinese Government declares that China will hereafter provide funds for building railways in South Manchuria; if foreign capital is required, the Chinese Government agrees to negotiate for the loan with Japanese capitalists first.

Another article:

The Chinese Government agrees that hereafter when a foreign loan is to be made on the security of the taxes of South Manchuria it will negotiate for the loan with the Japanese capitalists first.

And the following significant article clearly shows the intention of Japan to clinch her authority in the Chinese Empire:

The Chinese Government declares that hereafter if foreign advisers or instructors on political, financial, military, or police matters are to be employed in South Manchuria, Japanese will be employed first.

Another article makes the same provision with reference to eastern inner Mongolia as those just stipulated for South Manchuria.

CHINA'S REPLY TO JAPAN.

On the 1st of May, 1915, China replied to the various demands of Japan. Group I of the reply had reference to Shantung. Article 1 of that group acquiesced in the demand that the Chinese Government would give full assent to all matters in which the Japanese and German Governments might agree touching German rights in Shantung. But as thus agreed China made this reservation. China was not afraid of reservations in the treaty. She agreed with this reservation in the treaty, which is of extreme importance, because by its denial Japan shows as clearly as the sun in the noonday sky her intention not to return Shantung, but to retain her hold on it. Here is what the Chinese said to the Japanese by way of reservation:

The Japanese Government declare that when the Chinese Government give their assent to the disposition of interests above referred to, Japan will restore the leased territory of Kiaochow to China and further recognize the right of the Chinese Government to participate in the negotiations above referred to between Japan and Germany.

The question of the retention of Shantung was afterwards referred to in an exchange of notes.

JAPAN'S ULTIMATUM TO CHINA.

On the 7th of May, 1915, Japan issued a reply in the form of an ultimatum to China's answer to her previous demands.

With reference to Shantung, the Japanese Government say, and I call especial attention to the very careful and guarded manner in which the statement is made:

And at the same time it was offered that, on the acceptance of the revised proposal, the Imperial Government would, at a suitable opportunity, restore, with fair and proper conditions, to the Chinese Government, the Kiaochow territory, in the acquisition of which the Imperial Government had made a great sacrifice.

In other words, Japan agreed, in this conditional language, to restore Kiaochow to China, provided China agreed to all the other demands put upon her in the 21 demands, by virtue of which, if enforced, she would take complete control economically, commercially, and politically of the Chinese Republic.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Senator refers to these demands as 21 in number. Were they not 24?

Mr. WATSON. They were 21 in the first demand. Afterwards objections were made to group 5, and Japan then revised them, and in the revision they were 24.

Mr. THOMAS. I thank the Senator for his explanation.

Mr. WATSON. These demands close with this threat, Senators, not veiled, not obscured, but bold, open, and defiant, made at a time when all the world was engaged in the greatest war of history, and at a time when Japan knew that she could easily coerce helpless China into agreeing to her imperative demand. This is the demand. Listen to it, for it speaks trumpet-tongued of the intention of Japan with reference to China:

The Imperial Government again offer their advice, and hope that the Chinese Government, upon this advice, will give a satisfactory reply by 6 o'clock p. m. on the 9th day of May. It is hereby declared that if no satisfactory reply is received before or at the specific time, the Imperial Government will take steps they may deem necessary.

My friends, this discloses the entire intention of Japan with reference not only to the Province of Shantung but the whole of the Chinese Empire. These demands were not in settlement of previously pending controversies between China and Japan, and they were not advanced on the grounds that Japan had suffered wrong from China for which she was asking reparation; nor were there any national promises obligating China to surrender the very important rights that Japan demanded. The only ground for Japan's action was that it would "promote peace and good will between the two countries." Japan's ulterior motive is easily seen in the time and the manner these demands were made, and clearly shows a determination on the part of Japan to take full possession of the Chinese Empire.

And it is worthy of note that these demands were presented directly to Yuan Shih Hai, the President of the Republic, and not through the minister of foreign affairs, as is the case in the manner of ordinary diplomatic usage.

Secrecy was enjoined upon the President, and he was told that if he acceded to them he might be assured of the aid of Japan in his own ambitions, but if he did not the Japanese Government would not hold itself responsible for the future acts of either the Japanese or Chinese people in China.

And the mendacious character of these demands and the untoward conduct of Japan throughout the transaction is further evidenced by the fact that when, notwithstanding the injunction of secrecy, it became rumored that Japan had made certain demands upon China, Japanese officials denied it. Then, when it became no longer possible to conceal the truth, the Japanese Government officials supplied the other treaty-making powers with what purported to be a list of the demands—a list which it was afterwards ascertained omitted some of the most important and some of the most drastic features.

WHAT WILL SHE RETURN?

In an accompanying exchange of notes the Japanese ambassador to China promised in the name of their Government that the territory of Kiaochow would be restored to China, but only upon the condition that the whole of Kiaochow Bay should be opened as a commercial port, and that there should be "a concession under the exclusive jurisdiction of Japan to be established at a place designated by the Japanese Government, and that there is to be an international concession if the other powers should so desire." It now appears that Japan, not knowing how tremendous the moral power and the aroused conscience of the world might be, is prepared, if she must, to hand back these concessions to China. But what would she retain? She has already marked out for herself an area in the district of Tsingtau, which includes the entire water front suitable for commercial purposes, and the railway approaches, and site of the railway station. Thus, if the time comes when she will be compelled to restore these rights, it will be only the empty shell, so far as Tsingtau is concerned, that will be handed back.

I challenge any man to read the 24 revised demands made by Japan of China in 1915 without coming to the conclusion that Japan intended by that treaty to acquire such rights in China that she never could be dislodged and that would almost immediately give her a complete economic control and, at a very early date, the complete political control of the Chinese Empire. And all this is exceedingly important in determining Japan's veiled announcements of an intention to retire from Shantung at some time in the future.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. KING. The Senator referred a moment ago to the proposition which Japan made by which she would make a cession of her interests in Kiaochow, reserving an exclusive jurisdiction over a small portion to be thereafter selected. It has been contended by the friends of Japan that that is merely a reservation for residential purposes, such as is usually granted in foreign lands, and such as Japan contemplated in this case should be granted to the other powers. Does the Senator think that that contention by the friends of Japan is not warranted by the facts as they have been shown at the peace conference and elsewhere? In other words, does the Senator think that she sought something in addition to the mere residential concession?

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I am trying to argue, by showing the full relations existing between Japan and China for a series of years, the clear purpose and intention of Japan with reference to China. I do not believe that this concession is of consequence or that it will ever be relied on, unless, forced by the moral power of the conscience of the world, Japan is compelled to give back to China what legitimately belongs to her. Then she will fall back upon this final concession; but it is a last-ditch proposition, and, to use an ordinary expression, if the Senator will permit it, I believe that now it is mere national camouflage.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WATSON. I yield; yes.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will permit me, in connection with the question asked by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], as to what Japan would retain if she gave up Tsingtau, this city in the Kiaochow country, of course until she makes some proposition and tells what she is going to return and what she is going to retain, no one can say definitely. But it is a fact now well known that she is preparing to retain not only the residential section, as contended by the Senator from Utah, but the most valuable portion of that city, controlling the railroads, controlling the inlet and the outlet, and that the part she will probably give up is of practically no consequence—as the Senator from Indiana has said, simply an empty shell—but she is already preparing, in the buildings that she is constructing and the things she is doing, to retain everything that is of any particular value.

Mr. WATSON. I am obliged to the Senator from Nebraska for his remarks, because he is thoroughly competent to discuss the question.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Japanese have already transplanted about 16,000 Japanese citizens into that particular territory.

Mr. WATSON. Yes; which possibly has some bearing on the question at issue.

Mr. BORAH. Especially if reduced to a residential proposition.

Mr. WATSON. Therefore my contention is that she acquired nothing by her treaty with China in 1915, for it, too, was obtained by duress; it, too, was founded on fraud; and Japan's rights under it are no greater or better or more valid than those Germany had in the same Province in 1914.

The Allies were afraid to trust Japanese troops in Siberia without the troops of other nations being sent with her, and, though they limited the number of troops she should send to that country, she actually put in there many times that number, her evident intention being to stay there just as she has stayed in all these other countries.

When Japan dislodged Germany she landed troops on the coast of neutral China a hundred miles from Tsingtau, and military occupation of the railway was immediately pushed to Tsinan, more than 250 miles distant from Tsingtau.

Not content with military occupation extended to the very heart of this great Province, which in size and population practically equals Great Britain, the Japanese disregarded the territorial sovereignty of China and instituted civil government at various points along the railway lines, and even at Tsinanfu itself.

When thus considered from every angle, I do not believe that anyone will contend that Japan ever intends to withdraw from Shantung or from the other parts of China that she has so basely penetrated. Nor does she intend to surrender her hold on Manchuria. Nor does she intend to withdraw from Mongolia. Nor does she intend to discontinue her efforts to dominate the whole of the Chinese Republic.

If she desires to withdraw from China, she can do so. Certainly no one is preventing her. Assuredly all nations are anxious that she shall, and, if she is not now in a position to immediately withdraw, she can certainly fix a time for her withdrawal and thus satisfy the demands of civilization. The mere fact that she neither withdraws nor states that she will withdraw nor fixes a definite time of withdrawal is in itself a sufficient evidence that she never intends to withdraw.

SHOULD WE RATIFY THE TREATY?

Senators, I do not believe that the treaty should be ratified unless and until Japan either withdraws from China or states in unequivocal terms that she will withdraw, or, better still, fixes a definite date of withdrawal. If we ratify the treaty with the Shantung provision in it we give this robbery the seal of our approval; we condone all of Japan's past wrongdoing in all parts of the Chinese Republic; we ratify a secret agreement made between Japan and the allied nations in derogation of the rights of China and in base betrayal of an ally, and we place in Japan's hands a blanket indorsement of whatever future action she may see fit to take in the Chinese Empire. Personally I shall not vote for the peace treaty itself unless some modification is made of the article with reference to Shantung, or until we at least have expressed our intense disapproval of her conduct, coupled with an explicit statement of our determination to take this matter up at once after the league is formed and press for a righteous solution of the problem, for I believe it to be as monstrous a proposition as has even been proposed to civilization.

To summarize: My contention is that Japan succeeded to nothing but the rights of Germany in Shantung by reason of having dislodged her in 1914; that she acquired nothing additional by the treaty of 1915, because it was wrung from China by force; that she acquired nothing additional by her secret treaty with the Allies in 1917, because all that they promised to give her were the rights that Germany possessed in Shantung before the war; and that her temporary possession of Shantung was terminated when China made the declaration of war against Germany and became her ally and our ally and the ally of all the other countries in the conflict against imperial Germany. This is not only true from the legal standpoint but, if I may use such an expression, it is more conspicuously true when viewed from the moral standpoint, for assuredly never has a greater wrong been perpetrated than the crimes of these countries against China, and never did a nation have a more righteous basis on which to appeal to the judgment and conscience of civilization.

THE CONFLICT IN THE FAR EAST.

Having gained a foothold on Chinese soil by the treaty of 1898, Germany was not slow to improve her opportunity. By three supplemental treaties, which she wrung from China by superior power, she further fastened herself upon the Province of Shantung until in her relentless grasp that unfortunate people was utterly helpless.

Japan looked upon this formidable entrance of Germany into the Far East with grave solicitude. She understood full well the ambition of the Kaiser to dominate the world, and therefore she could not fail to recognize the menace to her own dreams of territorial conquest of an intrenched Germany in China; for in order to fully appreciate the monstrous wrong perpetrated upon China by this proposed treaty, it must always be remembered that Japan is the Germany of the Orient.

The German war party well understood the purpose of Japan with reference to China and the danger of permitting that country to control the commerce and the territory of the Chinese Empire, and therefore they eagerly seized the first opportunity presented to intrench themselves in China in order to prevent the seizure of either territory or power by their Japanese rivals.

Having forced China to surrender the port of Kiaochow, they immediately fortified it and at once began to lay systematic plans to take control of the entire interior of that country, which they could have readily accomplished under the terms of supplemental treaties made in 1899, 1900, and 1905.

JAPAN IN THE WAR.

No sooner had the war broken out in Europe than Japan seized the opportunity presented to rob Germany of her Chinese possessions; she then extorted concessions from China by the treaty of 1915; but, not content with that, she entered into a secret arrangement with the Allies for a distribution of the spoils of war at its conclusion.

Her deal with England consisted of an agreement that Japan was to have Shantung and all the German islands in the Pacific north of the Equator, and in consideration of this concession England was to have all of the German islands south of the Equator.

In order to understand the morals of this deal which we are asked to ratify, we should remember that Japan next consulted France and there also succeeded in making a satisfactory trade—secret, to be sure. There was then much German shipping in all the ports of China, and particularly Kiaochow, and the question of obtaining ships was one of great consequence. Up to that time Japan had been using all of her power to keep China out of the war, because she was opposed to China being represented at the peace conference, and because her statesmen were fearful of the legal results of a declaration of war by China on her title to Kiaochow Bay and Shantung; and she was so determined on this course that, I want Senators to bear in mind, she even threatened China with invasion if that country should declare war. France entered into an arrangement with Japan by which France agreed to stand by the demands of Japan and to aid in securing her the control of Germany's possessions in China at the conclusion of the war, and by which Japan consented that China should make a declaration of war against Germany; and all this was done because Japan took advantage of the dire necessity of the Allies for ships and shipping, and in their extremity Japan literally blackmailed them into making this monstrous concession.

Japan afterwards won over Italy and Russia to her scheme, making secret treaties with them all. Thus assured, she entered the war, but entered it just far enough to seize Germany's possessions, and no further. She lost but 800 men during the entire struggle, she furnished few ships and no men anywhere except in Russia, and the sole part she played in the war was to seize the possessions of Germany in China, which she did under agreement to give them back, and which agreement she now utterly repudiates.

JAPAN'S DEMANDS ON CHINA.

And viewed from the moral standpoint, her demands on China in 1915 stand on no firmer a basis, for she very cunningly took advantage of the fact that the nations of the earth were at war and that the United States was at that time neutral to make her unreasonable and immoral demand on China couched in 21 articles. Among others—and I want the preachers of the country to know this—she stipulated that China should give Japan the right to propagate Buddhism throughout China.

On May 1 China partially acceded to and partially declined to grant these demands, whereupon, on the 7th of May, Japan issued an ultimatum to China in which she practically gave that helpless country the alternative of submitting or suffering the consequences. Thus forced, China consented, and by that consent practically surrendered her dominion to the mercy of Japan. No impartial student, familiar with the history of Japan, can read these demands without coming to the conclusion that she intended to fasten herself irrevocably upon China and finally dominate the Government and the people of that unfortunate country, and that she has no intention of surrendering Shantung to the Government of China. The main demand that—

> The Chinese Government engages to give full assent to all matters to which the Japanese may hereafter agree with the German Government relating to the disposition of all rights, interests, and concessions, which Germany, by virtue of treaty or otherwise possesses in relation to the Province of Shantung—most clearly shows the intention of Japan to make a deal with the Entente Allies by which she should obtain possession of Shantung and proves conclusively that she was forcing China to agree in advance to whatever terms she might in the future make. And there is much reason to believe that, fearing the ultimate success of the Allies, to whom she was contributing so little, and desiring to remain on sufficiently friendly terms with Germany to induce their Government in case they won to permit the retention of Shantung by Japan, the Japanese Government exchanged diplomatic notes with the German Government up to the time of the sure defeat of the German arms.

I do not charge that dogmatically, but it has been repeated on this floor by competent authority and up to this hour has not been authoritatively disputed.

JAPAN IN THE FAR EAST.

The President recently stated that Japan intends to return Shantung to China. If that be true, why is it not so written in the contract? Why is it not so nominated in the bond? Japan in the beginning stated that she was willing to return Shantung but the treaty does not so recite, and her past history flatly contradicts any such intention.

There was a time when Korea was under the control of China. Japan waged two wars with the announced purpose of insuring the independence of Korea. One of these was with China, waged ostensibly for that sole purpose, and the other with Russia, and in that one she proclaimed to the world that she was fighting partly for the independence of Korea and of Manchuria. And yet, having won in both wars, she very speedily annexed Korea and in 1910 made her a part of the Japanese Empire. When questioned as to her good faith, the excuse she gave to the world was that Korea was close to Formosa, and that she needed Korea in order to prevent her enemies from using Korea as a base of attack upon Formosa. And it is well to remember also that she had previously taken Formosa from China; and, according to that logic, she would soon have the whole of Asia under her domination.

One of Japan's alleged reasons for waging war with Russia was that she wanted to save Manchuria for China, but since that time she has peopled Manchuria with her nationals until it is to all intents and purposes a Japanese colony and one governed by methods almost Prussian in character.

It is well known that southern Manchuria is occupied by a Japanese army. At times during the late war the soldiers of other nations were subject to great indignities in that country, and a Japanese consul in explaining this treatment said: "In the view and contention of the Japanese Government you are in Japanese territory and must submit to the Japanese who are the ruling authority in the East and must be obeyed," and yet Manchuria belongs to China. That is the slogan of Japan and is the clearest announcement of her purpose that has been made.

The whole story of the treatment of China by Japan furnishes ample illustration of the fact that Japan intends to cling to Shantung and that her protestations of good faith are not to be believed. She regards Shantung as a spoil of war and one to which she is entitled by way of recognition of her services to the Allies. She has forced on China many secret treaties which would give her indefinite right there and enable her to dominate the Government and the people of that great empire, and now their Government seeks to make permanent the robbery of China and to secure for it the sanction of the world.

When Japan went to war she called on Germany to surrender Shantung to her and agreed to return it to China if compensation were made. At the peace conference the delegates from China offered to pay all the expense of Japan in taking possession of Shantung and to otherwise compensate her if she would redeem her promise and restore the Province, but China's claim was denied by the peace conference and her plea rejected. In the name of peace and harmony and world-wide brotherhood this outrage upon China was ratified and in the treaty is given the sanction of civilization!

Why was so monstrous a wrong thus recognized? What induced statesmen who were assembled to do justice to all nations to sanction so great a crime? Simply because it had to be done to save the league. President Wilson wanted the league. It was the sole object of his going to France, and for it he was and is willing to make great sacrifices of either foreign rights or American independence.

Japan, seeing his attitude, took advantage of him and forced him to indorse this wrong to China by the threat that if it were not done she would withdraw from the conference and would decline to ratify the league. And he yielded and is now endeavoring to have our Nation ratify this treaty and condone this wrong.

For while he may have in his pocket a statement by the Japanese representatives to that conference, it is no part of the contract, and if there be a withdrawal by Japan it will not be because of anything in the terms of the treaty of peace. It will be voluntary on the part of Japan.

JAPAN'S DEMANDS.

Therefore, as the result of our President's acts, Japan stands to-day between the Chinese Republic and one of its greatest Provinces. She would not consent to become a member of the league until the other powers had promised her Germany's possessions in China, possessions to which, in accordance with the high-sounding tenets of the "new order," Japan had no conceivable right.

When we went to war our President proclaimed that diplomacy was to be lifted from the mire and placed upon a high plane of honesty and fair dealing; that national selfishness was to be supplanted by international altruism; that the right of self-determination was to be established as the permanent policy of the future; and that the world should never know another Silesia, another Alsace-Lorraine.

And yet, at the peace conference in the representatives of Japan there reappeared the "old order," the old intrigue, the old savagery that "might makes right." And they forced our President to abandon his high ideals, to turn his back upon his lofty principles, and to accept their savage code.

Japan coerced him into that concession. Clemenceau and Lloyd-George felt bound by the terms of the old intrigue that divided the loot before the victory was won, and Wilson yielded that Japan might sign. That country sold her signature for the liberties of 36,000,000 human beings, and Wilson, Lloyd-George, and Clemenceau approved the bargain and ratified the sale.

This agreement was made at a time when Italy was absent from the conference and her representatives were in Rome. Knowing that their refusal to sign at such a time would prevent the formation of the league, and taking advantage of Italy's absence and of our President's determination to form a league at any cost, the representatives of Japan pressed their demands with redoubled energy. They literally threw their contract before him and defiantly exclaimed: "Sign here or your league fails." Thus challenged, he yielded that he might execute his purpose, he signed that he might save his league, and the great wrong to China's millions was consummated. China, our ally, Japan's ally, was there demanding her rights. These were denied. She asked that this question might be referred to the league of nations when formed. But Japan blocked even this concession. By her attitude of defiance she gave them to understand that Shantung was hers and that she intended to keep it, regardless of the conference or the decree of any league of nations.

And so the last pillar of this league is based upon wrong, and thus founded it can not long endure. "For," as Wendell Phillips cried out to the slave oligarchy, "though you build your structure of granite, and though you pile it as high as the mountains, yet, if it be in the least mixed with evil, the pulse stroke of a child shall in time beat it into dust."

And in the name of democracy the head of the greatest Republic on earth smothered the only democratic stirrings in the Far East, condoned all the wrongs of Japan in the past, and literally turned over the whole of China to the brutal exploitation of the only militaristic power left in the world since the overthrow of the Kaiser.

China presented to the peace conference a claim based only on justice, but with no power behind it. Japan presented a case based only on power, but with no justice behind it. Japan and power won. China and justice lost. And the cause of democracy and the rule of the people in Asia were set back 100 years.

THE GREAT INCONSISTENCY.

And the most remarkable, the most indefensible, feature of this entire transaction is that, as a result of a war said to have been waged to make the world safe for democracy, we enforce the spoliation of the only Republic in the Orient, we ratify the previous robbery of a friendly people by the nation we went to war to overthrow for just such acts, and we turn the result of the larceny over to the most autocratic Government that now exists on earth, the counterpart of Germany in the East.

And, as if to emphasize the fact that nations, as well as men, when they start upon a scheme of pillage, will throw all discretion to the winds and rush to the extreme limit of wrong, as if by their very boldness they could make a virtue of their vice, it can never be forgotten that every nation whose representatives sat around the table at the peace conference and sanctioned this oriental crime—every one of them—had a treaty with China to protect the territorial integrity of her empire. They each committed there, in what ought to have been deemed a sanctuary, the same atrocious crime for the commission of which they went to war with Germany; each nation held its treaty to be but a scrap of paper; they all cast their agreements upon the dust heap; they trampled their honor under foot and outraged every Christian precept.

And they did all this, too, partly to carry out a secret agreement to divide the spoils of war, and at the table where they pretended to hold secret treaties in contempt and to glorify "open covenants openly arrived at."

JAPAN'S REAL POSITION.

Now, Senators, my contention is that the day China declared war against Germany and became our ally every vestige of title Germany held in China reverted to that country. And this is especially true in the light of the new interpretation of the rule of justice in the world. We correctly interpreted that rule in giving back Alsace-Lorraine to France, and it can not be regarded as other than a perversion of right to hold differently as to Shantung. I contend, therefore, that Japan has no title to Shantung simply because she dislodged Germany in that Province.

The shrewd rulers of Japan evidently believed that this would be the finding of the peace conference, if she could show no greater right to Shantung than that she had simply displaced Germany, and that is why she afterwards made her secret agreement with the Allies by which her title to this Province was to be secured by the use of power.

My further contention is that when she took possession of Shantung from the Germans she promised that it should be returned to China. And, further, Count Okuma, in 1914, made an express promise to this country that these possessions should be turned back to China, to whom they legitimately belong. That significant message should speak trumpet-tongued to Japan and call her to her sense of duty and responsibility to us and to the other nations of the world. Said he:

I gladly seize the opportunity to send through the medium of the Independent a message to the people of the United States, who have always been helpful and loyal friends of Japan.

It is my desire to convince your people of the sincerity of my Government and of my people in all their utterances and assurances connected with the present regrettable situation in Europe and the Far East.

Every sense of loyalty and honor obliges Japan to cooperate with Great Britain to clear from these waters the enemies who in the past, the present, and the future menace her interests, her trade, her shipping, and her people's lives.

This Far Eastern situation is not of our seeking.

It was ever my desire to maintain peace, as will be amply proven; as president of the Peace Society of Japan I have consistently so endeavored.

I have read with admiration the lofty message of President Wilson to his people on the subject of neutrality.

We of Japan are appreciative of the spirit and motives that prompted the head of your great Nation, and we feel confident that his message will meet with a national response.

As premier of Japan I have stated, and I now again state to the people of America and of the world, that Japan has no ulterior motive, no desire to secure more territory, no thought of depriving China or other peoples of anything which they now possess.

My Government and my people have given their word and their pledge, which will be as honorably kept as Japan always keeps promises.

OKUMA.

That is what alarms me.

This constitutes an express promise to the people of the United States, and we now have the right to demand that Japan keep that promise and withdraw from Shantung.

As a proof of the fact that Japan went to war only to seize German possessions in the Orient, I cite a clause of the letter written by the Japanese foreign minister to the French ambassador at Tokyo with reference to the secret treaty consummated in 1917:

The French Government is thoroughly informed of all the efforts the Japanese Government has made in a firm manner to accomplish its task in the present war, and particularly to guarantee for the future the peace of oriental Asia and the security of the Japanese Empire, for which it is absolutely necessary to take from Germany its bases of political, military, and economical activities in the Far East.

This conclusively shows the reason that impelled Japan to enter the war. She was actuated by no altruistic motive; she was not disturbed about universal brotherhood; she held up no high ideals as a reason for her action; she undoubtedly stated the truth when she said "that the security of the Japanese Empire, for which it is absolutely necessary to take from Germany its bases," was the one thought her rulers had in mind when they declared war against Germany.

By the treaty of 1915 Japan evidently intended to retain the Province of Shantung, and just as evidently intended to make it a base of action from which she might afterwards take complete control of the Chinese Government. Japan, apparently without any particular reason known to the outside world at the time, but which now clearly enough appears to have been but another link in the chain forged by her to bind poor China, in January, 1915, or after taking possession of Shantung, made her imperious demands upon China for the express purpose of obtaining control of the Empire. Can any impartial man study the record of Japan with reference to these other countries or study her actions with reference to Shantung and say that she intends to retire from there and give her possessions back to China? If so, why does she not do it? Nobody impedes her. Nobody hinders her. Nobody is standing in the way of her taking this action. If she is not ready to act, why does she not at least say that she intends to take this step? If she is not ready to fix a specified time of withdrawal, why does she not announce to the world her purpose to withdraw and state that she soon will fix a time when that action will be taken? The whole history of the transaction fully convinces me that she entered the war for the purpose of preventing the further spread of Germany in the Orient and as well to take permanent possession of Shantung, which she never intends to give up if we ratify this treaty, and thus condone all the wrongs she has committed up to the present time, and thus permanently entrench her in that unfortunate country.

I shall not take the time of the Senate in a discussion of these articles of the treaty, because I am taking longer than I anticipated, and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has served notice that he wishes to speak. He always illuminates every subject to which he addresses his intellect, and I am very anxious to hear him.

Mr. THOMAS. I hope the Senator from Indiana will not abbreviate his discussion on my account, because I am greatly interested in his address.

Mr. WATSON. I thank the Senator very much.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator from Indiana submit to a question or two?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understood him to say that as long as the Shantung provisions were in this treaty it would not have his support. I wish to ask him what would be the gain to China, in a practical way, if the Senate of the United States should eliminate the Shantung provision from the treaty? Japan would be in possession of the Shantung interests, and that possession would have been ratified by Great Britain, France, and the other parties to the treaty. In what way would we proceed, then, to oust Japan from the holding of those interests in the Shantung Peninsula?

Mr. WATSON. My answer to that is very simple. Whatever the result might be to China, the result in which I am interested is to the United States, for we would not give our approval to such an act as that; we would not condone that wrong, and that is precisely what we do if we ratify the treaty and permit Japan to hold Shantung. Then it becomes our act, and whatever the future might hold for us that is our act. I say to the Senator that is why I object to it, and that is especially pertinent in view of the new construction of internationalism with which we are now being regaled from day to day.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then suppose, as the result of a failure or refusal on our part to ratify this treaty, the league of nations should fail and should not go into effect. To what court could China appeal for the vindication of her rights in the Shantung Peninsula?

Mr. WATSON. She could appeal only to that moral power in the world, I will say, that has always been in existence. I wish to remind the Senator that back in the time when John Hay was Secretary of State, back in the time—and I speak with all due respect to our Chief Executive as an individual and as President—when we had as President of the United States an American who believed in America before he believed in any other nation of the world, and the same nations that are now seeking to dismember China sought then to dismember her, we simply reached out our hand across the ocean and warned them to stand back; and all the hungry hordes stood back, and they have been standing back, too, until this day when, through the league of nations, they are about to consummate the very wrong which they could not then consummate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator from Indiana lose sight of the fact that it was while John Hay was Secretary of State that Germany got from China her concession in the Shantung——

Mr. WATSON. I do not.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me finish, please—her concession in the Shantung Peninsula?

Mr. WATSON. On the 6th of March, 1898.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And that it was John Hay who on behalf of the United States signed the diplomatic communication to Germany complimenting Germany upon the manner in which she was proceeding to administer her concession of the Shantung Peninsula and acquiescing in her possession of that concession? Has the Senator from Indiana forgotten that fact?

Mr. WATSON. Precisely; I am aware of that fact. The Senator from Nebraska must also remember that we were then in the Spanish-American War; the Senator must also remember that on the 1st day of May, 1898, Dewey sailed into Manila Bay; the Senator must remember that just previous to that time we were preparing to enter that war, and for months we had, in a quiet way, been making preparation to that end, as the Senator knows. The Senator further knows that before Prince Henry went to Kiaochow to enforce his demand upon China he was in Manila Bay. The Senator further knows that he sailed there farther than Dewey wanted him to sail. The Senator further knows that Dewey served notice on him that if he sailed across a certain line he would send a shot across the bow of his ship. The Senator knows that, and that we were in the midst of a very delicate situation and very strained relations as between the United States and Germany. Just at that time the German fleet sailed into Kiaochow Bay, and Germany forced the Shantung concession from China while we were at war with Spain and did not want to take on another war. That was the situation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. So that the Senator excuses John Hay, then Secretary of State, for acquiescing in what was forced from China by Germany at that time?

Mr. WATSON. I do, at that time. I remember very well that Abraham Lincoln said "one war at a time"; and I think that was a very wise policy to pursue. We did not want to get into war with Germany, and our relations with Germany were very much strained at that time.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Can the Senator from Indiana also tell who was President of the United States and who was Secretary of State at the time that Japan grabbed Korea? Does the Senator recall a treaty which the United States had with Korea, which was made in 1882, in which we pledged ourselves as a Nation in case the integrity of Korea was threatened to make friendly representations on her behalf?

Mr. WATSON. I remember that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Can the Senator recall any representations or any effort that was made by the United States, and does he remember the appeal the Koreans made to the United States?

Mr. WATSON. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And the manner in which it was ignored by the then President of the United States and the then Secretary of State, whom he now lauds?

Mr. WATSON. I do; and I remember this, furthermore, Mr. President and Senators, that two wrongs do not make a right and a multiplication of wrongs does not build up a right. I remember this, further, that we are not called on to deal with that transaction now; we are not called on to deal with any of those intrigues now, but only with this one. This one is in the treaty and now on the table before us. The others have passed into history; but this one we will have to deal with; we are face to face with it. The others are behind us. This is all I am dealing with. If we acted wrongly in that instance, it is no reason why we should continue to act wrongly in the instance which now confronts us, the problem which demands our immediate attention.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from Indiana at that point?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to ask the Senator from Indiana if he does not also think that there is a difference between remaining silent and seeing a wrong perpetrated and doing nothing and actively participating in doing the wrong?

Mr. WATSON. Precisely; that is what I aimed to state a while ago.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator from Indiana permit me an interruption?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. KING. It was more than a silent acquiescence with respect to the first matter to which the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] referred, for John Hay affirmatively approved of it.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but does the Senator from Utah now urge that as a reason for the approval of the Shantung provisions of the treaty? If he does, then why not say that Alsace-Lorraine belongs to Germany? Germany wrenched those beautiful Provinces from France and all the world stood by and saw it done and knew it was wrong. When we got into this war the first cry raised was that that wrong should be righted and that those provinces should be given back to France; and also in the case of Belgium that Belgium should be restored, although it was recaptured in the main by English troops, as Alsace and Lorraine were, in part at least, captured by American troops; but no one claims that we ought to keep Alsace and Lorraine or that England ought to keep Belgium.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Indiana pardon a further interruption?

Mr. WATSON. I yield.

Mr. KING. I am making no argument one way or the other; I am not condoning the wrong.

Mr. NORRIS. Neither am I condoning the wrong.

Mr. KING. I am not condoning the ravishment of Alsace and Lorraine; I am not condoning the wrong that was committed by Germany in seizing Chinese possessions; but I was merely adverting to the fact that the Senator from Indiana is expending all of his condemnation upon a Democratic administration for attempting to write a treaty that will in the future protect China against aggression while he apparently forgets the wrongs which a Republican administration condoned and approved a number of years ago.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. McCORMICK addressed the Chair.

Mr. WATSON. I yield to the Senator from Idaho first.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not think there can be a successful defense made for this Government in regard to the Korean matter. I feel that its action in that behalf was without foundation in morals or in justice. We connived at the wrong, if we did not absolutely approve of it. We are now conniving at the Shantung seizure, and we may absolutely approve it. The real point to be made now is whether or not this particular Senate, which is condemning both transactions, will have courage sufficient to take action at this time. Will we in the end, by mere protest or ineffective action, continue to sustain this immoral conduct toward China?

Mr. WATSON. Precisely. I now yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I merely wish to interrupt the Senator to ask if it be not true that in the instance of the abdication of the Korean Emperor the only official communication which our Government received represented that the Korean Government voluntarily surrendered its sovereignty, whereas in this instance the Chinese Government has resisted, in so far as is possible, the cession of Shantung?

Mr. NORRIS and Mr. THOMAS addressed the Chair.

Mr. McCORMICK. I have not quite concluded.

Mr. THOMAS. I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. McCORMICK. The argument has been made, and justly made, that our acquiescence in that past wrong is not to be justified. There is this distinction, however, that China formally and publicly, through its recognized representatives, has objected to this unrighteous proposal. We are aware of that fact here on this floor, and if we are a party to this wrong it will not be by acquiescence but by our deliberate act.

Mr. THOMAS and Mr. NORRIS addressed the Chair.

Mr. WATSON. May I yield first to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the statement made by the Senator from Illinois is historically correct, but it is not quite complete. The only official communication which this Government received was the one mentioned by the Senator. An attempt was made by the Koreans to submit a communication, but the attempt was blocked by Japan and failed.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want the occasion to pass without saying that I do not believe that the United States Government can justify its course in the Korean matter. While it is true that there was no official communication except the one of which the Senator from Illinois speaks, there were communications, both telegraphic and written, sent by officials of the Korean Government, and I shall take occasion before this debate is over—and would do it now if I had the papers at hand—to read their contents. They do not throw any credit upon our Government, in my judgment, but far be it from my purpose to offer that as an excuse for the commission of another crime like it, especially now, when we must take positive action in this case, while in the other we were merely silent.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Colorado a question?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from Colorado did not mean to say that China had not protested to this Government against the Shantung cession, did he?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, certainly not.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. My remark had reference to Korea entirely. China has protested, I think in every way that a nation could possibly protest, against the ratification or the adoption of the Shantung articles of the treaty.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. Probably the Senator from Indiana has already made the point, but I only came into the Chamber a few moments ago. No doubt, however, he is aware that at Paris China, within, I think, a few hours of the signing of the treaty, offered to sign if she could be permitted to reserve the right subsequently to open the question of Shantung before the league of nations, but even that was refused.

Mr. WATSON. I have already made that statement.

Mr. LODGE. I dare say the Senator has, but I was not present at the time.

Mr. WATSON. She also wanted to make it a part of the annex, as it was called, and that likewise was denied.

Mr. BORAH. I call the Senator's attention to that attempt at reservation, and to the successful manner in which it worked.

Mr. WATSON. Yes; but the question is now before a different tribunal, I will say to the Senator from Idaho.

THE TERMS OF THE SURRENDER.

Section 8 of the treaty of peace provides for the transfer of German rights and privileges in Shantung to Japan.

One of the three articles having reference to this transfer—section 156—reads as follows:

SECTION 8.—SHANTUNG.

ARTICLE 156.

Germany renounces, in favor of Japan, all her rights, title, and privileges, particularly those concerning the territory of Kiaochow, railways, mines, and submarine cables which she acquired in virtue of the treaty concluded by her with China on March 6, 1898, and of all other arrangements relative to the Province of Shantung.

I pass over all comment on the most peculiar language of this article save to remark that I can see no difference between rights "particularly" and rights "generally" conveyed, no difference to China who loses them, no difference to Japan who receives them. And I might say in passing that no lawyer would ever write a contract between two parties and convey from one to the other "all other arrangements" between them relative to the subject of the contract. Such language thus employed refers evidently to the other treaties between Germany and China; and if so, those words are intended to conceal rather than to convey their real meaning.

TREATY OF 1917.

Mr. President and Senators, I believe that the secret treaty made by Japan with the Allies in 1917 should not be countenanced by them or by us at this time, because it rests on wrong and is established on fraud.

It was a fraud on China, because by the terms of that understanding Japan got China into the war, that country never dreaming that as a part of the agreement by which she was induced to declare war her territory was to be divided and her people despoiled; and Japan and England and France used Chinese men and Chinese resources to the limit of their capacity to do so in a fight to overthrow autocracy and establish freedom, and all the time poor China was aiding the cause of her allies and her sons were bleeding in their defense they had a secret agreement among themselves that just as soon as the war was over they intended to divide the empire of their helpless ally and permanently dismember her land. There never was a baser betrayal of a friend, a more brutal robbery of an ally, than in this plunder of weak but willing, feeble but faithful China; and, like Banquo's ghost, it will not down, but will ever return to trouble those who consummated this mighty wrong.

And then, when it came to the peace table, England and France, having joined this plunderbund and having raked in their share of the booty, felt bound to see that Japan got hers as well.

They all knew that if it came to a square decision between the formation of the league on one hand and the rights of China on the other, that Wilson would forsake China and cling to the league; and, impelled by this territorial lust, these original conspirators in this intrigue combined to force the President's hand, and succeeded, contrary to every principle of right and every precept of justice.

A FRAUD ON THE UNITED STATES.

And this secret treaty of Japan with the Allies was as well a fraud on our Government. Japan entered the war in 1914, and at once took possession of Germany's rights in China. Early in 1917, as soon as it became evident that the United States would be drawn into the war, and that therefore the allied cause would probably triumph, Japan opened negotiations, first with England, then with France, and afterwards with Italy and Russia, by which she very cunningly proposed a division of the spoils after the war, and in each agreement she stipulated that a portion of her share should be the former German possessions in China.

She then got the consent of the Allies to hold Shantung. She did not deem it wise to disclose her purpose to the United States, evidently fearing that our friendship for China was too strong and our love of justice too great to permit this wrong, and so took a circuitous route to win the approval of this Government.

She obtained consent of the Allies to continue her possession of Shantung in February and March of 1917. Later on in the year, after the United States had entered the war, there were disquieting rumors as to difficulties arising between Japan and the United States in the Orient, and especially in regard to China. Let us remember that Japan had been in Shantung almost three years, that she had already entered into a secret arrangement with the Allies to remain there, and that she was exceedingly anxious to obtain some kind of an agreement from the United States that would prevent this country from interfering with the consummation of her purpose in China. To this end she entered into several conversations with Secretary Lansing, the ostensible object being to once more state the friendly relation that existed between the two countries in order to subdue any threats of trouble, but the real purpose of which was to literally trap the United States into an agreement establishing an oriental Monroe doctrine and placing Japan within that sphere of influence in the same situation as that occupied by this country in the Western Hemisphere. And she did this to retain her hold on Shantung and to enable her to make whatever further inroads she pleased in China.

The text of the Lansing-Ishii agreement is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, November 2, 1917.

EXCELLENCY: I have the honor to communicate herein my understanding of the agreement reached by us in our recent conversations touching the questions of mutual interest to our Governments relating to the Republic of China.

In order to silence mischievous reports that have from time to time been circulated, it is believed by us that a public announcement once more of the desires and intentions shared by our two Governments with regard to China is advisable.

The Governments of the United States and Japan recognize that territorial propinquity creates special relations between countries, and, consequently, the Government of the United States recognizes that Japan has special interests in China, particularly in the part to which her possessions are contiguous.

The territorial sovereignty of China, nevertheless, remains unimpaired, and the Government of the United States has every confidence in the repeated assurances of the Imperial Japanese Government that while geographical position gives Japan such special interests, they have no desire to discriminate against the trade of other nations or to disregard the commercial rights granted by China in treaties with other powers.

The Governments of the United States and Japan deny that they have any purpose to infringe in any way the independence or territorial integrity of China, and they declare, furthermore, that they always adhere to the principle of the so-called "open door," or equal opportunity for commerce and industry in China.

Moreover, they mutually declare that they are opposed to the acquisition by any government of any special rights or privileges that would affect the independence or territorial integrity of China or that would deny to the subjects or citizens of any country the full enjoyment of equal opportunity in the commerce and industry of China.

I shall be glad to have Your Excellency confirm this understanding of the agreement reached by us.

Accept, Excellency, the renewed assurance of my highest consideration.

ROBERT LANSING.

His Excellency Viscount KIKUJIRO ISHII,
Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of Japan on Special Mission.

(The ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary of Japan, on special mission to the Secretary of State.)

THE SPECIAL MISSION OF JAPAN,
Washington, November 2, 1917.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note to-day, communicating to me your understanding of the agreement reached by us in our recent conversations touching the questions of mutual interest to our Governments relating to the Republic of China.

I am happy to be able to confirm to you, under authorization of my Government, the understanding in question set forth in the following terms:

In order to silence mischievous reports that have from time to time been circulated, it is believed by us that a public announcement once more of the desires and intentions shared by our two Governments with regard to China is advisable.

The Governments of Japan and the United States recognize that territorial propinquity creates special relations between countries, and consequently the Government of the United States recognizes that Japan has special interests in China, particularly in the part to which her possessions are contiguous.

The territorial sovereignty of China, nevertheless, remains unimpaired, and the Government of the United States has every confidence in the repeated assurances of the Imperial Japanese Government that, while geographical position gives Japan such special interests, they have no desire to discriminate against the trade of other nations or to disregard the commercial rights heretofore granted by China in treaties with other powers.

The Governments of Japan and the United States deny that they have any purpose to infringe in any way the independence or territorial integrity of China, and they declare, furthermore, that they always adhere to the principle of the so-called "open door" or equal opportunity for commerce and industry in China.

Moreover, they mutually declare that they are opposed to the acquisition by any Government of any special rights or privileges that would affect the independence or territorial integrity of China or that would deny to the subjects or citizens of any country the full enjoyment of equal opportunity in the commerce and industry of China.

I take this opportunity to convey to you, sir, the assurances of my highest consideration.

K. ISHII,
Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of Japan on Special Mission.

Hon. ROBERT LANSING,
Secretary of State.

Neither President Wilson nor Secretary Lansing knew at that time that Japan had secret treaties with the Allies by the terms of which she was to hold Shantung after the war; and thus when her representative agreed with Lansing that—

The territorial sovereignty of China, nevertheless, remains unimpaired.

And, further, when she joined in a declaration with our country that—

The Governments of Japan and the United States deny that they have any purpose to infringe in any way the independence or territorial integrity of China.

And further, when she agreed with our Government that—

Moreover, they mutually declare that they are opposed to the acquisition by any Government of any special rights or privileges that would affect the independence or territorial integrity of China or that would deny to the subjects or citizens of any country the full enjoyment of equal opportunity in the commerce and industry of China—

She practiced the foulest kind of deceit upon our Government.

For during all these negotiations Japan had a treaty with the Allies which she religiously kept from the knowledge of this country, by which she was to be protected in doing the very things she agreed in the Lansing-Ishii negotiations not to do. She had a treaty by which the Allies were to enable her to do the very thing she was agreeing with Lansing that neither she nor any other nation would do or would be permitted to do, and this, I submit, is as perfidious an instance of international treachery and betrayal as the diplomatic history of the world, crooked and indefensible as much of it has been and full of startling disclosures, has ever witnessed.

THE RESULT.

Japan, thus entrenched, is seated firmly on the throne of power in the Orient. She dislodged Germany from China; she forced that country into granting her rights that will mean the perpetual rule of Japan in the Chinese Empire; she obtained secret treaties with the allied countries by mutual agreement to divide the spoils, by which they covenanted not to interfere with her in her oriental designs; she obtained from the United States full authority to act in the Orient; she forced our President to recognize all these acts and covenants in the peace treaty, and now all she lacks is the consent of the United States Senate to this treaty in order to consummate the robbery and perpetuate the crime. I can not believe that this body will ever countenance such action. I can not believe that we are willing to base a policy of government upon so corrupt a foundation. I can not bring myself to think that this Senate will ever ratify this treaty unless some assurance is given by Japan that she will abandon Shantung within a specified time, or, failing in that, that limitations will be placed upon the Shantung provision in the treaty that will guarantee the rights of the Chinese people to their own territory and their own liberty.

And it is especially true that we can not condone this conduct on the part of Japan in the light of the President's interpretation of just such acts, for in his address to this body on the 10th he expressly referred to and denounced—entanglements which contemplated any dispositions of territory, any extensions of sovereignty, that might seem to be in the interest of those who had the power to insist on them, without thought of what the peoples concerned might wish or profit by.

Assuredly we can not hold that this is a pure idealism, incapable of enforcement, or that it is right in Europe and America but wrong in Asia, for principles can never be said to have so narrow an application. And we have now come to a place where we must either enforce this doctrine or abandon it, where we must quit talking or else make our deeds square with our words.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what kind of an assurance from Japan will be satisfactory?

Mr. WATSON. The only kind of assurance that will be satisfactory to me will be an unequivocal statement by Japan of a withdrawal within the next 30 days—in other words, before this league treaty can be acted on by the Senate of the United States, that she will withdraw not only from Kiaochow, Kiaochow Bay and environs, but from Shantung.

Mr. BORAH. Then, if I understand the Senator correctly, his policy is—and if I understand him correctly, I agree with it—that the withdrawal of Japan shall be consummated before we ratify this treaty, and the treaty made to conform?

Mr. WATSON. Precisely; precisely.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator, assuming that to be done, what becomes of this part of the treaty then, in which the German concessions are turned over to Japan, if she has already surrendered them? Would it not be necessary, if that were done, just to strike that out of the treaty?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I had in my mind the fact that these properties without this treaty now belong to China; that they reverted to China when China declared war on Germany.

Mr. WATSON. Without any doubt.

Mr. BORAH. That was my idea.

Mr. NORRIS. The point that I desire to make, if the Senator will permit me, is that if the property was absolutely turned back to China, let us say, as the Senator from Indiana says, before we passed on the treaty, and we approved the treaty with those three sections in it, it would be absolutely contradictory to the facts——

Mr. WATSON. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. NORRIS. Because the treaty says that these concessions shall be turned over to Japan. Why is not the solution of it to amend the treaty by striking out the word "Japan" and inserting the word "China," turning them directly back to China?

Mr. WATSON. I will say to the Senator that any of those solutions is satisfactory to me.

ANOTHER SIDE.

My next contention is that the people of Shantung should have the right to say what disposition is to be made of their territory, and that three men in a secret chamber in Paris had no scintilla of right to hand 36,000,000 of people around as if they were property, or to drive them about as if they were cattle, or to bargain away their rights to placate a stronger power. Either this or the doctrine of self-determination is a snare and a delusion.

The able Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], in his speech in the Senate on the 24th ultimo, with reference to Shantung, thus excuses this wrong:

In view of the fact that the commercial relations of nearly all nations with China are based on duress in some form, and in contemplation of the further fact that the most important treaties now in force between the various nations are the outcome of wars—which, of course, are the supreme manifestations of duress—why should the claim that China was induced to make the treaty with Japan through fear of war invalidate that treaty, and all other treaties with China, many of which she was compelled by war to execute, be left in force? If we go back into history and invalidate every treaty into which duress entered, chaos in international relations will result.

Which is, in substance, the same assertion as that made by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] in the question he asked me but a few moments ago. The answer to it is, just as I answered him, that we are not now concerned with old treaties except as they are presented to us by this instrument. The only treaties with which we are here concerned are the ones between Germany and China, and between Japan and China, and between Japan and the Allies. They lead up to and elucidate the Shantung articles in the treaty the Senate is now considering. All the other treaties to which the Senator refers are in the past. We are dealing with this one now. They are not called in question here. This one is. We are not asked to condone past wrongs except as they relate to China, and we are striking at the only one of these indefensible treaties that is presented to us for consideration.

Was it not of just such treaties that the President spoke when he said:

Old entanglements of every kind stood in the way—promises which Governments had made to one another in the days when might and right were confused and the power of the victor was without restraint.

That is precisely the case presented to us in this one instance—the only one with which we are required to deal in this instrument. And shall we turn our backs on the lofty announcement of the President and ratify these "old entanglements"? Shall we condone the acts of Germans and Japanese made with reference to China in the days when "might and right were confused and the power of the victor was without restraint"?

And again the Senator says:

Shall we assert that treaties tainted with duress in which Japan is interested must be invalidated and at the same time recognize English, French, and Russian compacts with the Chinese Government—compacts, for the most part, extorted through wars engaged in for the express purpose of compelling China to yield?

Mr. President, those English, French, and Russian compacts with the Chinese Government are not presented to us for our consideration here and now. The one between Japan and China is, and we are asked to ratify it. The one between Japan and the Allies is, and we are asked to sanction it. Again I answer the assertion of the Senator by a statement of the President in which he declares that "the Central Powers had lived in open violence of many of the very rights for which the war had been fought, dominating alien peoples over whom they had no natural right to rule, enforcing not obedience but veritable bondage, exploiting those who were weak for the benefit of those who were masters and overlords only by the force of arms."

Mr. President, in the old days the attitude of the Senator from Arkansas might have been established upon some substantial basis, but in the light of the "new order" there is no place for him to stand when he advocates the condonation of such acts. The President very forcefully said in his last address to the Senate, speaking of just such agreements as the ones now advocated by the Senator from Arkansas:

These were all arrangements of power, not arrangements of natural union or associations. It was the imperative task of those who would make peace and make it intelligently to establish a new order which would rest upon the free choice of peoples rather than upon the arbitrary authority of Hapsburgs or Hohenzollerns.

And he might with propriety have added Mikados.

THE NEW ORDER.

Can it be said that taint no longer vitiates title? Does wrong ever become right? Can duress piled upon duress, can force added to force, make unrighteousness holy? Can the German wrong in China plus the Japanese wrong in China plus the Japanese wrong with the Allies ever come to the full fruition of a perfect right? Can these three wrongs constitute a lasting foundation upon which an enduring superstructure of justice can be reared?

The President said:

The German colonies were to be disposed of. They had not been governed; they had been exploited merely, without thought of the interest or even the ordinary human rights of the inhabitants.

Based upon such wrong, can Japan's title be right when she herself sought to enforce her title by precisely the same methods?

The President helped to formulate this treaty. He brings it back to us and asks us to ratify it without amendment. He states the ideals upon which it is based and the principles which by its means he hopes to work out in the world. Can it be that he believes in Japanese rights in Shantung? In his celebrated address to the Senate on the 22d of January, 1917, in describing the character of peace which must be made if it is to be lasting, he said that it must be—a peace that will win the approval of mankind, not merely a peace that will serve the several interests and immediate aims of the nations engaged.

Words could not be more fittingly used to describe the character of the treaty he asks us to accept. Surely the secret treaty of the Allies to divide the spoils of war before the victory without consulting with our country, surely the deliberate policy of Japan, the undeviating course she pursued during all the vicissitudes of war, surely these do not constitute the basis for the kind of peace of which the President spoke.

PEACE WITHOUT VICTORY.

And, Senators, in that portion of the address last referred to, in which the President clearly set forth from his viewpoint the basis of a just and lasting peace, he took occasion to inveigh against the very kind of treaty he now asks us to ratify.

Victory—

Said he—would mean peace forced upon the loser, a victor's terms imposed upon the vanquished. It would be accepted in humiliation, under duress, at an intolerable sacrifice, and would leave a sting, a resentment, a bitter memory upon which terms of peace would rest, not permanently, but only as upon quicksand. Only a peace between equals can last. Only a peace the very principle of which is equality and a common participation in a common benefit. The right state of mind, the right feeling between nations, is as necessary for a lasting peace as is the just settlement of vexed questions of territory or of racial and national allegiance.

Senators, if the President were to apply the principle set forth in his own language to the treaty that he has brought back to us with reference to China, he could not look upon it without shuddering, he could not think of it without horror for it violates every principle he announced; it runs counter to every right theory he propounded. It crushes every ideal he held up.

And, Mr. President, as if he were striking at a monstrous theory, as if he in fancy beheld a wicked conception of government, he set forth in two statements at once the climax of crime and the climax of fair dealing from the national standpoint. Said he:

And there is a deeper thing involved than even equality of right among organized nations. No peace can last, or ought to last, which does not recognize and accept the principle that governments derive all their just powers from the consent of the governed, and that no right anywhere exists to hand peoples about from sovereignty to sovereignty as if they were property.

And yet the President brings back to us this treaty based upon the very language he here sets forth and asks us to ratify an arrangement by which he and two other men have handed 36,000,000 people "from sovereignty to sovereignty as if they were property," without consulting with a single one of them, without ever dreaming of applying the rule that governments derive their just power from the consent of the governed.

And, finally, in answer to the Senator from Arkansas and in contravention of the principle he announced as a justification for this treaty, I desire to once more quote the President and ask the Senator how he can reconcile his statement of right with the announcement of the ideal so beautifully set forth by the Chief Executive?

Any peace—

Said he—

which does not recognize and accept this principle will inevitably be upset. It will not rest upon the affections or the convictions of mankind. The ferment of spirit of whole populations will fight subtly and constantly against it, and all the world will sympathize. The world can be at peace only if its life is stable, and there can be no stability where the will is in rebellion, where there is not tranquillity of spirit, and a sense of justice, of freedom, and of right.

My next contention is that if all of these foregoing provisions are rejected and Japan's right to Shantung is recognized, then we must validate all her claims; we must turn over to her all the rights that Germany stole by the treaty of 1898 and the three supplemental treaties of 1899, 1900, and 1905; we must recognize the validity of all her secret treaties with China in the past by virtue of which she practically controls that empire; we must recognize her claim to all the rights she acquired by her secret treaty with the Allies in 1917; we must set aside the doctrine of self-determination of peoples as applied to Shantung while applying it to many nations in Europe; we must quench the ardor and blast the hope of the only democracy in the Orient; we must recognize the binding force of the savage code of Germany in accordance with which she robbed China and Shantung and which we perpetuate in Japan; we must validate in the Orient the black doctrine that might makes right; and we must give enormous impetus to the one autocratic power left on earth, the one that will some day dominate the whole of Asia, as Prussia dominated the central empires, and if we do we shall place ourselves in a position where the spirit of retributive justice will some day call us to account for having violated such sacred principles when we had the power to enforce them.

The remainder of article 156 of the treaty of peace we are now considering reads as follows. I shall also insert articles 157 and 158.

All German rights in the Tsingtao-Tsinanfu Railway, including its branch lines, together with its subsidiary property of all kinds, stations, shops, fixed and rolling stock, mines, plant, and material for the exploitation of the mines, are and remain acquired by Japan, together with all rights and privileges attaching thereto.

The German State submarine cables from Tsingtao to Shanghai and from Tsingtao to Chefoo, with all the rights, privileges, and properties attaching thereto, are similarly acquired by Japan, free and clear of all charges and encumbrances.

ARTICLE 157.

The movable and immovable property owned by the German State in the territory of Kiaochow, as well as all the rights which Germany might claim in consequence of the works or improvements made or of the expenses incurred by her, directly or indirectly, in connection with this territory, are and remain acquired by Japan, free and clear of all charges and encumbrances.

ARTICLE 158.

Germany shall hand over to Japan within three months from the coming into force of the present treaty, the archives, registers, plans, title deeds, and documents of every kind, wherever they may be, relating to the administration, whether civil, military, financial, judicial, or other, of the territory of Kiaochow.

Mr. President, if we shall demand that the article of the treaty relating to Shantung be stricken out or that reservations shall be made concerning it, it can not be truthfully said that in taking this course we are actuated by malice toward Japan, for the United States pointed the way of progress to that nation. Seated in semidarkness, the first rays that shone about her came from the searchlight of American civilization. From the day that Commodore Perry entered the harbor of Nagasaki, as the harbinger of a new day for that empire, three score and seven years ago, down to this hour the two nations have been fast friends, and there is no lover of peace in all the earth, certainly not here, who does not hope that those amicable relations will be preserved.

Throughout these years, notwithstanding wide differences in forms of government, our motives in dealing with her have been altogether altruistic. We have sought not to harm her but to help her, not to pull her down but to build her up. Certainly we have no dread of her influence, assuredly we are not jealous of her power, and Japan should be made to understand that in whatever action we may take here we are guided by none other than the kindliest of feelings for her government and her people.

If we are seeking to modify those articles in the treaty that have reference to Shantung, let it be known to the world that by so doing we are not striking at Japan, but that we are only seeking to deal justly with China, that we are but endeavoring to preserve her territory from spoliation, and that we criticize Japan only as she interferes with these objects. In this discussion, then, we are not impelled by any desire to do an injustice to Japan, to limit her authority or curb her power, but solely by a determination to see to it that China, our other friend and ally, is not plundered by those who should champion her sovereignty. If we are the friends of both, and that our history attests, we must deal justly with both. But that does not confer a right on Japan to despoil China and then hide behind our mutual friendship for protection. She must not seek to conceal her plunder behind the rampart of our good will. We shall deal with them both at arms length, and in the open, and with exact justice. We want our friendship for both to be so strong that it will compel them to be friendly to each other and thus refrain from taking any advantage of the other's weakness. Our conduct toward them both has been wholly benevolent, and this should teach them to practice this same spirit toward each other. And if either does not, she need not expect full friendship from us until the evil is undone. Therefore, if Senators speak harshly concerning Japan and her course in this Shantung affair, it is with the purpose of arousing her from her moral lethargy, of startling her from her selfishness, of awakening her to a sense of her responsibility to the other nations of the earth, and of attempting to teach her that her highest duty toward China is not to plunder her but to aid her; not to prey upon her but to assist her in working out her own destiny in accordance with the will of her own people.

JAPAN'S INTENTIONS.

The President has said that Japan soon intends to relinquish her hold upon Shantung. But Japan has not so declared, and he has no authority to bind the Mikado's people. And, sir, all the evidence is to the contrary. China was at the peace conference pleading that her right to Shantung be inserted in the treaty. When this was denied and her representatives were coldly informed that all of Germany's rights were to be transferred to Japan "for a brief period" they asked that the time be specifically stated in the terms. But Japan was there to block this proceeding, and at her behest they shut the door of hope in the face of pleading China, and all the assurance she has of the restoration of her territory is a nebulous promise made by a mythical "some one" with no authority to speak and no power to bind.

Can Japan complain if we demand the reason for this action? We went to war, in part, to undo the wrong wrought by Germany, and surely here is one that enlists the sympathy and challenges the attention of our country, aye and of civilization, for it seeks to perpetuate one of the most flagrant wrongs ever committed by the agents of the Kaiser upon a helpless and unoffending people.

By the terms of the peace treaty Belgium is to be restored, and likewise Alsace-Lorraine, Poland, Schleswig-Holstein, and Roumania. The proponents of this instrument proclaim their intention of righting the infinite wrongs committed by Germany and Austria, and yet they ask us, by the terms of the same treaty that undoes all these evils, to ratify and perpetuate one that, which while not so bloody as the others, is yet as vicious in principle, as unwarranted in justice, and as infamous in purpose as any of those we are overturning.

Surely Japan can not be heard to protest if we investigate her conduct in this affair. Senators, she can prevent further discussion of this question, here or elsewhere, she can set herself right in the eyes of all Americans, she can justify the esteem in which she is held by her European friends, and she can vindicate her claim to high purpose and noble impulse by a single declaration of intention to yield back Shantung to China at an early day. And if she does not so declare, when there is every inducement for her to do so, then she must abide by the results of an investigation of her conduct, to whatever length such investigation may lead.

AMERICA AND CHINA.

For we must remember that China, too, is our friend, and that in the war just closed, she, too, was our ally. During these decades while we have stretched forth one hand to aid Japan, we have likewise stretched forth the other to aid China. We have helped them both, we have befriended them both, China, perhaps, more than Japan because she was the weaker and needed the greater aid.

Time and again we have seen the Chinese Empire made the victim of the intrigue, the cunning, the force of other nations, and we have always gone to the extreme limit in the use of our good offices to save her from their power.

This culminated in the decade beginning with 1890 in a well-established effort on the part of a number of them to dismember her and divide her territory among them as spoils and to close her ports to all but their own commerce. But the American Government stretched forth its arm and commanded them to desist and all the hungry horde stood back. And we did it voluntarily. We were not coerced by any league of nations. We were not ordered by any foreign council. For the nations that will compose that body, when organized, will be the same as those who were largely responsible for the scheme to divide the territory of China, those who expected to be enriched by the booty of their enterprise.

And now these same nations, through the instrumentality of a league of nations, are permitting this same dismemberment, are sanctioning this same robbery, and our hands are bound by the terms of this same agreement and we can no longer reach them out to prevent it; in fact, by the very terms of the treaty we sanction it in advance. And if we enter the league we shall not be permitted to stop what we before prevented; in fact, we are forced to become a party to the very crime the commission of which we hindered, and are foiled by the very nations that arranged to commit it before—and all in the name of Christian peace! It is time that the mask of Christianity should be torn from the face of hypocrisy and that this thing should be made to stand forth in its true character.

CHINA OUR ALLY.

And the wrong thus perpetrated becomes all the more apparent when it is remembered that China was our ally in the war; that she sent battalions of laborers to France and to other countries upon demand; that she supplied all the ships she had to further the allied purpose; and that she furnished all the food she could spare in order to aid the allied cause. She has received no benefit whatever from having entered the service and cast her lot with the Allies, and yet she did more for the allied cause than Japan. She secures no beneficial results by the treaty, her services were all rendered in vain, while Japan, by reason of a secret treaty, made before the beginning of the war, perpetuates a crime committed by Germany and fastens herself upon a Province of great strategic importance and of vast mineral wealth for her exploitation. Thirty-six millions of people are robbed of their rights and plundered of their possessions without the least pretext of justification and against every appeal of the voice of conscience.

UNITED STATES AND CHINA.

The people of China believe in the United States. We have been her one great and only friend. The nations of the earth within the recent past sought to dismember her and to divide her territory as spoils among them, but John Hay, backed by the united American people, prevented the consummation of that great wrong; and now, through the league of nations, supposedly formed in the name of fraternity and Christianity, these same nations consent to this very dismemberment. The President willingly throws aside the work of Burlingame, casts the efforts of Hay upon the scrap heap, and not only consents to the robbing of China by Japan but seeks to force us to fight to sustain the robbery and protect the robbers.

ARTICLE 10.

It can not be denied that if the people of Shantung revolt against the galling yoke of Japan, if they weary of her tyrannical and despotic régime and attempt to cast it off, and if China shall rise to defend her own people, then by the provisions of article 10 we shall be compelled to send American soldiers at the expense of our own people to subdue China, struggling for the possession of her rightful territory and fighting for the recovering of her own.

We send missionaries to China to teach the principles of the Christian religion. We pour out our money with lavish hand to inculcate the doctrines of Jesus of Nazareth in the land of Confucius. And we do right. But it ill becomes us after all this effort and all the sacrifices of our missionaries to carry the truths of Christianity to these people, to sanction an arrangement that will fasten upon them the rule of a nation that is opposed to Christianity, whose inhabitants are largely Shintoists and Buddhists, that recently forced upon China an agreement by which she consented to permit Japanese to teach Buddhism in China, that has systematically persecuted Christian missionaries, and that in all things has shown herself bitterly hostile to Christianity, the Christian religion, and the Christian Church.

Japan's hostilities toward Christian missions and Christian preachers in Korea have been so extensive and long continued and severe as to amount almost to barbarism, and it is not to be presumed that her treatment of the representatives of the Christian religion in China will be of a milder or a more friendly character.

If the league of nations is to be formed and Japan is to become a member, let her come into it with clean hands. If she is to sit in the chamber of the council where she, with eight other nations, will direct the destiny of the world, let her prove herself worthy of such high trust. She should not be permitted to sit as one of the judges to determine either the legality or the morals of her larceny. Before she sits in that august tribunal, unless it is to become the gigantic mockery of history, she should be made to leave her stolen fruits outside of the temple gates, and, once in, she should release her associates from all obligation to execute the treaty they made in the dark in 1917.

None of these nations should be permitted to conceal beneath the cloak of righteousness the results of their own wrongdoing. When they come into it, if it is to be formed, let it be at least with the spirit of this Nation, which seeks no indemnities, which asks no territory, and which wants no reward save that which springs alone from the consciousness of a mighty task most worthily performed.

Let them not, while proclaiming peace, hold fast to the results of a militaristic policy practiced upon a helpless race. Let them not come in the name of freedom and fasten the chains of servitude upon a weak and innocent race.

Better Germany in China than Japan, for there Germany was isolated; there she had no neighboring garrisons, while Japan is everywhere. Japan is in Formosa, in Korea, in Manchuria, in Mongolia; Japan is everywhere in the neighborhood of China, and wherever she is she is slowly but surely reaching out her tentacles of power to clutch and hold as spoils the territory of that new Republic.

When they talk of a peace that shall be lasting because founded on justice, our answer shall be "Shantung." When they speak of the equality of races and the right of self-determination of peoples, our response shall be "Shantung." When they proclaim that the central thought of their treaty is that all Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed, our reply shall be "Shantung."

Shantung is the fraud that vitiates the entire contract, and Shantung is the cancer that carries the death-dealing poison to the whole body of the treaty. And even though proclaimed in the name of peace, yet the everlasting law of righteousness will prevent the tranquillity of the earth while so great a wrong remains unavenged. Senators, there is but one method of peace and that is that all the nations of the world shall be inspired by the sense of justice that ever impels the American people and which is at once the pride and the power of the American Republic.

DEMANDS OF RAILWAY TRAINMEN AND RACE RIOTS.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, before the adjournment yesterday afternoon I asked and was given permission to insert in the RECORD an editorial from the New York Times entitled "The brotherhood demands." At the same time I stated that I would to-day offer to the Senate some observations upon the subject to which that article relates, if the opportunity presented itself.

The editorial to which I refer, Mr. President, is a very temperate, independent, thoughtful, and just criticism, in my opinion, of what are known as the brotherhood demands, the formulation of which appeared day before yesterday in the newspapers of the country, and which were to some extent elaborated this morning.

I was struck also by the fact that in some respects this editorial was unique in that it assumed to consider the situation from the standpoint of the public interest and upon its merits. There was a time when America had an independent press, one which carefully and constantly and fearlessly discussed public and sometimes private questions, thereby informing and educating the public, and controlling, in large degree, the general direction of governmental affairs.

It is only now and then, however, that we are favored with that class of editorial discussion, and largely because the commercial spirit has spread its pernicious influence as well over the editorial columns of the American press as over other activities, and it is the advertiser who now directs the impulses of journalism, and checks before they are published their too searching editorial policies and expressions of opinion. I say this in sorrow, Mr. President, much more than in anger, because a very salutary and essential influence in public affairs has thus been greatly minimized, and I fear it may be ultimately extinguished.

We have had, during the past three or four weeks, two very serious outbreaks in America, one in the Capital City of the Union, the other in the great city of Chicago. To my mind both these occurrences are of the most sinister import, coming as they did and when they did. We are generally prone in this body and in that at the other end of the Capitol to take up promptly and discuss public events, and express our views upon them, thus communicating to each other, at least, considerable information of general importance, and giving to the country in some degree the legislative view upon them. But it is a significant fact, Mr. President, that up to this time, as far as my knowledge goes, there has been no reference, in this body at least, and I think in the House, except in a general way, to these occurrences, notwithstanding the fact that they presage one feature of the general conditions of unrest that indicate a possible serious insurrection or war between the races.

Ordinarily such conditions would be very important. Combined as they are with strikes, I. W. W. propaganda, the spread or attempted spread of Bolshevist literature and program, to say nothing of the unsettled condition of the world, they demand very serious consideration, much more consideration than I have the time at present to devote to them.

Mr. President, as one result of this war, conducted by the people of the United States with a unanimity in which all differences of sentiment, of race, and of color were for the time eliminated, I had hoped that the service rendered in common by the American soldier to the American Union, whatever his race or nativity, would result in a settlement of those unfortunate conflicts and contests which have so long disfigured American civilization and enabled the people of other nations, when subjected to our criticism, to retort by calling attention to many acts of cruelty and of oppressive discrimination in the United States. But I see no symptoms of such a regeneration, and I fear, Mr. President, that unless the moral sentiment of the Nation speedily asserts itself, unless the people take to heart the lesson which these two outbreaks so plainly teaches, we shall, among other things, have to determine in this country some of the problems which have so long vexed the Balkans, and which to-day constitute the chief obstacle to the settlement of that unhappy section of Europe. For the races are commingled here as there, and they will lead to the same consequences unless the principles of equal justice to all shall govern our conduct and guide our policies.

Is it because we shrink from a contemplation of issues directly before us, hoping thus to escape their consequences, that we make no mention of these things? Are we like the guest in Vathek, suffering from some incurable wound, afraid to speak of it, and do we conceal it with our hands that no other may see or suspect its existence? If so, then, like him, Mr. President, all our efforts in that direction will be unavailing. So far as I am concerned I shall, if no one else assumes to do so, on an appropriate occasion, ask for some inquiry into the primal causes of these two disturbances, so that if possible we may take proper steps to prevent their recurrence.

I do know this, that the white man is the superior—in his own estimation, in any event—of the black man, and is his superior in opportunity, experience, and education; and it is his duty, therefore, to set the example to his colored fellow citizen in all that appertains to the performance of civic duty and the enjoyment of civic privilege. The negro has demonstrated his loyalty to America by sealing his devotion with his blood, and he has earned his right to the equal protection of the laws by the supreme test of civilization. Let him not reproach us with denying him justice. But, Mr. President, my purpose now is to focus the attention of the Senate for a few moments upon what may be properly termed the industrial condition precipitated by the demands of the five great brotherhoods of railway employees and to which the editorial of the Times relates, because I believe that their immediate consequences are quite as important to the American people as the pending treaty of peace, for they may lead to a disintegration of American institutions and certainly to a revolution of some kind, although it may prove to be an exclusively economic one.

There is no question, Mr. President, about the existence of causes for industrial unrest. There is no question about the justice of complaints offered from many sources regarding the difficulties of obtaining a livelihood within the limits of compensation and of a consequent discontent which, in times past, has frequently led to outbreaks of a bloody and violent character. I was about to say that these conditions were perhaps more acute in America than in other sections of the world, but perhaps that would be too extravagant a statement. They are certainly more acute and affect every man, woman, and child in America more closely than any similar condition in our past history. And yet they differ from previous conditions, not in kind but in degree only. We have had them as the consequence of every war that has been waged since government was established. They accompanied and followed the War of the Revolution, the Civil War, the Napoleonic wars, as they have attended and followed the Kaiser's war. They are the inevitable result of great industrial and economic upheavals which attend every great war, and we can no more avoid them than we can avoid the operation of any other natural law. We may minimize their operations in some respect, perhaps, but we can not abolish them by legislation nor by the constant interplay of an increase in wages, followed as it inevitably is by an increase in the price of the necessities which the wage earners are obliged to secure with their compensation.

Our credit, Mr. President, has been inflated almost to the bursting point, necessitated by our participation in a conflict more than 3,000 miles from home. In the prosecution of the Civil War the Federal Government inflated its credit by the issue of greenbacks. In this war we have inflated our credit by the issuance of bonds, the only real difference being that in the one instance the greenback was endowed with power of legal tender and in the other the bond possesses no such attribute. We have also doubled, perhaps trebled, the amount of currency circulation. It is no more possible under such circumstances to prevent the decrease of the purchasing power of the dollar, which is but another way of saying that we can no more prevent the rise in the price of all articles of commerce, than we can prevent the rising tides of the ocean; and such legislation as has been up to this time proposed to that end I greatly fear will be about as effective as the command of King Canute in the years gone by to the waves that they recede and the tides that they rise no more.

So, Mr. President, we have thus far, and particularly with regard to the employees of the Government, been engaged in a game of battledore and shuttlecock. We have tossed the ball over on one side by an increase of salaries, and it has been at once tossed back by the other side in a corresponding increase in the necessities of life. Now, the brotherhoods recognize that fact. They say so. They virtually admit in their present demands, by the mouths of their leaders, that this vicious circle will continue. But what they demand is that there shall be an increase aggregating something like $800,000,000 per annum, and at the same time they demand legislation which will seize some twenty thousand millions of property and turn it over to them, in connection with others whom they name, for private exploitation. I use that word in no invidious sense. I have no doubt that many men believe that it is entirely within their power by expropriating the transportation systems of the country to make them in all respects efficient and profitable under public management. I have sometimes thought so myself in the ante bellum days. It may be that such will be the result if this experiment in government shall be made, but surely so momentous a step should not be taken by the legislators of the country, sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, without the most serious investigation, without a study of the situation both economically and historically, and without, to use an old expression, being sure we are right before we go ahead.

Now, what is the proposition? On the 2d of August, in a statement which I shall ask permission to have printed in the RECORD and from which I make only one or two quotations, in a pronunciamento or a proclamation or a message to the American people, or whatever you may choose to call it, signed by Mr. Warren S. Stone, grand chief Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers; by Mr. W. G. Lee, president of the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen; by Timothy Shea, acting chief Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen; L. E. Sheppard, president Order of Railway Conductors; and B. M. Jewell, acting president Railway Employees Department, American Federation of Labor—

Labor faces a persistently serious situation, due to the cost of living and the impossibility of wages keeping pace with the depreciation of money. No fundamental changes are being advanced to save workers from continual defeat in the economic struggle of life. The railroad employees are in no mood to brook the return of the lines to their former control, since all the plans suggested for this settlement of the problems leave labor essentially where it has stood and where it is determined to stand.

We realize that in the strife for wage increases we can not win any permanent victory. It is not money but value which counts. The vicious circle is infinite; increased wages are overcapitalized for inflated profits, and the cost of goods mounts faster than the wage level. A few grow wealthy and the multitude is impoverished.

Any basic change must begin with the railroads—

And so forth.

The matter referred to is as follows:

BROTHERHOODS DEFEND FEDERAL CONTROL AS STEP TOWARD REDUCING COST OF LIVING.

WASHINGTON, August 2, 1919.

The statement issued to-day by the four brotherhoods of railroad employees, in which they demand Government ownership of the railroads on a profit-sharing basis with employees, follows:

Labor faces a persistently serious situation, due to the cost of living and the impossibility of wages keeping pace with the depreciation of money. No fundamental changes are being advanced to save workers from continual defeat in the economic struggle of life. The railroad employees are in no mood to brook the return of the lines to their former control, since all the plans suggested for this settlement of the problems leave labor essentially where it has stood and where it is determined to stand.

We realize that in the strife for wage increases we can not win any permanent victory. It is not money but value which counts. The vicious circle is infinite; increased wages are overcapitalized, for inflated profits, and the cost of goods mounts faster than the wage level. A few grow wealthy and the multitude is impoverished.

Any basic change must begin with the railroads. We believe the interests of labor and the public to be identical in the railroad question. The properties have been operated for the profit of the few, not for the service of the many. Not only have we suffered from inadequate wages, but the public has paid an extortionate tax for transportation, a tax based on inflated values and collected from every person buying the necessaries of life.

Our proposal is to operate the railroads democratically, applying the principles to industry for which in international affairs the Nation has participated in a World War. President Wilson declared in his message of May 20, 1919, for the "genuine democratization of industry, based upon a full recognition of the right of those who work, in whatever rank, to participate in some organic way in every decision which directly affects their welfare in the part they are to play in industry." He spoke plainly in behalf of a "genuine cooperation and partnership based upon real community of interest and participation in control."

It has been argued that labor is merely asking the public to let the workers become the railroad profiteers in place of Wall Street. This argument can not survive a scrutiny of our proposal.

We do ask for a share of the surplus at the end of each year, after operating costs are met and fixed charges are paid; but we also provide an automatic reduction in rates when this surplus comes to a given level. To restore the surplus the employees of the railroads must increase the efficiency of their management and they must invite new business. What we ask is to share the saving from economies we ourselves introduce and to share the surplus from new business our efficiency makes possible. We should not profit from the railroads as financiers have done; we should participate in the increased earnings from our increased production. We could not earn dividends unless industry as a whole were stimulated by improved transportation service.

In our bill the rights of the public are protected. The rate-fixing power, which is the final check upon railroad management, remains with the Interstate Commerce Commission. If the new corporation should attempt to pay itself excessive returns and produce a deficit, the lease is forfeitable.

As to the danger of collusion between the directors of labor and the directors of management to vote to absorb the surplus by raising wages and thus destroy the incentive of dividends, the bill makes a sound provision. We believe that the dividend system is essential if service is to be the motive and not profits. We arranged to give to management twice the rate of dividend the classified employees receive. So management's dividend is always double what its increase of wages would be, and management would never vote to use the surplus for a wage increase at the sacrifice of half of its own gains. To obtain a wage increase the classified employees would have to win the vote of the public directors.

We assure the public immediate savings. The cost of capital would be reduced from the present 6 to 7 per cent paid to Wall Street to 4 per cent paid upon Government securities. The savings assured under a unified system are enormous. The savings through efficiency rendered possible only by democratic operation are even greater, for the increased production resulting from harmonious relations between employees and their managers are incalculable. We believe our plan will reduce transportation charges in surprising measure and that it is the first and the most important step in any constructive effort to lower the cost of living.

Mr. THOMAS. Prior to the issuance of this announcement the Associated Press dispatches informed us that something like 270,000 railroad employees, Government employees, highly paid and paid out of the Public Treasury, had struck and proposed to continue striking until the demands for an increase in wages commensurate with the high cost of living had been arranged for. The same dispatches also announced that these employees struck in defiance of the orders of their leaders. Yesterday it was announced that a considerable addition had been made to this enormous army of strikers, and this morning we are told that a referendum is being taken for the purpose of determining upon a universal strike of all the Government employees engaged in the operation of the railroads not later than the 2d day of September unless their demands are complied with, the principal of which is the enactment into law of the so-called Plumb bill for the operation of the railroads by Government ownership. This morning representatives of these brotherhoods published what is called a text of labor's demand to operate the railroads of the United States, appearing in the columns of all the papers, and I ask permission to insert in the RECORD this added statement to the announcement of August 2. I will read but one or two extracts from it:

It marks the step by which organized labor passes from demands for wage increases to demands that the system of profits in industry be overhauled. Hitherto, during successive wage negotiations and arbitration awards, we have called for provisional settlements only of questions arising out of differences as to wages, hours, and conditions of labor. That principle of "genuine cooperation and partnership based upon a real community of interest and participation in control," of which President Wilson has spoken to Congress, has been ignored both by labor and by the private owners of the railroads.

I will read the closing sentences:

The railroads are the key industry of the Nation. They affect at once the prices of every necessity. As increased transportation costs are reflected in the increased prices of all commodities, so a reduction in those costs must be reflected by reduced prices.

We say this because of labor's interest as consumer, as part of an overburdened public. This fundamental statement of principle we respectfully submit to the American people.

It is signed by all the chiefs except Mr. Lee, and a note at the bottom of the announcement informs us that he is absent from the city.

The matter referred to is as follows:

TEXT OF LABOR'S DEMAND TO OPERATE THE RAILROADS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Representatives of the Brotherhoods of Railroad Engineers, Firemen, Conductors, and representatives of the American Federation of Labor issued the following statement to the public yesterday:

"The innuendoes in telegraphed dispatches from Washington, appearing also in the speech of Representative BLANTON, of Texas, that the railroad unions are 'holding up Congress and the Government' may as well cease. This appeal is made to the American people direct. It invokes the judgment and common sense of public sentiment, of all the public which earns a wage or a stipend. We recognize that the only way in which we can exist under the present system is to demand further increase in wages. But we agree with Representative BLANTON that this affords but temporary relief. It does not offer a remedy.

"Labor's bill, on the other hand, provides a remedy, and we ask merely that its terms be scrutinized. Our full argument in support of these terms will be presented on Wednesday before the House Committee on Interstate Commerce. In this statement we are sounding the note of our basic principle.

SEEK TO BENEFIT PEOPLE.

"That this rôle originates with labor is merely because labor happens to have firm organizations through which it may become articulate. It is not to benefit labor as labor alone; it is to benefit the consuming public of which labor at present is the audible part. In labor's bill providing that the public take over the railroads and establish a tripartite control between the public, the railway operating management, and the employees, the labor organizations of America have established this new policy, which envisages their condition not only as producers, but also as consumers.

"It marks the step by which organized labor passes from demands for wage increases to demands that the system of profits in industry be overhauled. Hitherto, during successive wage negotiations and arbitration awards, we have called for provisional settlements only of questions arising out of differences as to wages, hours, and conditions of labor. That principle of 'genuine cooperation and partnership based upon a real community of interest and participation in control,' of which President Wilson has spoken to Congress, has been ignored both by labor and by the private owners of the railroads.

COSTS SPIRAL UPWARD.

"What wage increases have been received during the past few years resulted only in immediately being followed by more than proportionate increases in the cost of living. Each rise in wages has turned out to mean only temporary relief for the affected workers. When the increases have gone around the circle, labor as producer loses the advantage of the wages through the additional cost it pays as consumer. Moreover, through compounded profits taken on these wage increases each cycle becomes an upward spiral of costs, which the consuming public vainly reaches to control.

"As the major part of the consuming public, labor is entitled to representation on the directorate of the railroads. As a producer of capital, it is entitled to representation on the directorate of the railroads. To capital, which is the fruit of yesterday's labor, we now propose to discharge every just obligation. We demand that the owners of capital, who represent only financial interests as distinguished from operating brains and energy, be retired from management, receiving Government bonds, with a fixed interest return, for every honest dollar that they have invested in the railway industry.

VEST ROADS IN PUBLIC.

"We ask that the railroads of the United States be vested in the public; that those actually engaged in conducting that industry, not from Wall Street, but from the railroad offices and yards and out on the railroad lines, shall take charge of this service for the public.

"These represent all the brains, skill, and energy that is in the business. They are entitled to that measure of control which is equal to their ability and their responsibility for operating the transportation properties. Then, and then only, will the service primarily be for the public, not primarily for profits to speculators and inflaters of capital. As a means for accomplishing this end, we ask that a lease be granted to a corporation created not for profit, but for public service. We ask that this corporation be controlled in its management by an equal representation of the three fundamental interests upon which industry is based. The public, operating managers, and wage earners will then guarantee both the integrity of the investment required for the conduct of the industry and that return which induces it by investing to enter the public service.

SHARE ALL EARNINGS.

"The public as consumers and the operating managers and wage earners as producers having joined in that guaranty will then share equally all earnings in excess of the amounts required to meet the guaranty.

"This is provided by granting to the wage earners and management one-half of the savings which they, through their perfected organizations, can make, and by securing to the public the other half, to be enjoyed by the consumers, either by increasing the means of service without increasing fixed charges or by reducing the cost of the service which the machinery then in existence can render. Thus the cost of transportation is automatically reduced exactly in proportion as benefits accrue to the producers of transportation. Increase in earning power of producers under this system can not be perfected in increased costs; it must be balanced by decreased costs.

RAILROADS KEY INDUSTRY.

"The railroads are the key industry of the Nation. They affect at once the prices of every necessity. As increased transportation costs are reflected in the increased price of all commodities, so a reduction in those costs must be reflected by reduced prices.

"We say this because of labor's interest as consumer as part of an overburdened public. This fundamental statement of principle we respectfully submit to the American people.

"Acting President Railway Employees' Department, American Federation of Labor.

"NOTE.—W. G. Lee, president Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, who was a signer of the first statement issued by the railway brotherhood officials, was absent from Washington at the time of the issuance of this statement."

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Jewell, the acting president of the railway employees' department and one of the signers of this statement, is reported to have made this statement in an interview:

Jewell made it plain that the railroad workers mean business. He said that the wage-board program proposed in Congress could not be accepted.

Now, mark:

"The railroads will be tied up so tight they will never run again if that legislation is passed," he declared, after the letter had been presented and the conference had ended.

I hope he has not been correctly reported, but as it consists with the statement which he signed I shall assume its accuracy.

In addition to this, some of the chiefs, if not all of them, visited the President of the United States and demanded that the requirement of an increase of wages be put into operation at once, refusing to wait for the slower processes of legislative consideration, and virtually carrying the implication that failing the demand the distributive system of the country would be paralyzed by a general strike, notwithstanding the universal suffering and misery, chaos, and possible insurrection and bloodshed that must follow from such an unhappy situation. And these gentlemen are all Government employees, drawing money from the Treasury of the United States, and, by implication at least, engaged directly in the service of the Government. I think that is a fair statement of their status.

Before commenting upon it, let me go back a little and call attention in a general way to the processes and the policies of congressional legislation and legislators since the close of the Civil War. We boast to ourselves that we are a Government of the people and against the classes; to use the good old Democratic slogan, we are for the masses and against the classes; but from the close of the Rebellion until the rise to political power of the wage-earners' organizations the legislation of the United States was dictated and controlled by the moneyed interests of the country. We all know that; nobody at present attempts to deny it. We gave the corporations all they demanded, and were under their influence politically as we were commercially. During that period of time a few voices, my own among the number, were heard crying in the wilderness, seeking in vain to direct public attention to the inevitable consequences of a policy of class legislation by which privileges were distributed at the public expense.

We had then an enormous public domain inviting settlement and occupation and operating as a vent, so to speak, for what would otherwise have been the explosive passions and discontents of a great Nation. We went so far, Mr. President, in our largesses of money, of privilege, and of domain that many of the wiser, more cautious and conservative beneficiaries saw the inevitable result of applications of the practice if successfully demanded in the interest of combinations of voters and in the other direction. That interest began to manifest itself about the time the country, as a result of the great panic of 1893, was thrown into economic and social disorder. From that time on, speaking by and large and for the same reason—that is to say, the political influence of the interests pressing upon Congress for attention—we began another system of class legislation quite as vicious as the former, but more popular because beneficial to larger numbers, always having, from the political standpoint of both parties, the main end in view.

If there is anything up to this time which has ever been demanded by the associations of labor and wage earners or by the associations of farmers throughout the country which we have not granted I can not at present recall what it is. The outcry against the trusts was followed by legislation which carefully excluded from its operation combinations of men, whether wage earners or farmers. These were sacrosanct because of their political power. Some of us incurred the displeasure of a portion of our constituencies for voting against these measures because of the exemptions and for calling attention to the danger of exempting from the operation of a general law any citizen of the United States. But we did it. We have not been able for years to pass an appropriation bill for the maintenance of our military and naval departments without voting an exemption or an exception which virtually excludes efficiency from the industrial operations of the constructive branches of these two great departments; and those of us who have attempted to equalize conditions have been, and will continue to be, equally unsuccessful.

In 1916 the economic situation so far as it affected the railroads presented itself to Congress in acute form and resulted in the enactment of what is called the Adamson law. Right there, Mr. President, let me make a statement upon the principle that honest confession is good for the soul. Before the Adamson bill was enacted the President sought an audience with the Democratic steering committee of the Senate, and, of course, it was granted. He there laid before it for consideration a plan of legislation to meet that crisis. It was afterwards embodied in his message, and I ask to insert in the RECORD a statement of the six proposed heads of legislation of which the principle of the Adamson law was only one.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission to do so will be granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

First, immediate provision for the enlargement and administrative reorganization of the Interstate Commerce Commission along the lines embodied in the bill recently passed by the House of Representatives and now awaiting action by the Senate; in order that the commission may be enabled to deal with the many great and various duties now devolving upon it with a promptness and thoroughness which are with its present constitution and means of action practically impossible.

Second, the establishment of an eight-hour day as the legal basis alike of work and of wages in the employment of all railway employees who are actually engaged in the work of operating trains in interstate transportation.

Third, the authorization of the appointment by the President of a small body of men to observe the actual results in experience of the adoption of the eight-hour day in railway transportation alike for the men and for the railroads; its effects in the matter of operating costs, in the application of the existing practices and agreements to the new conditions, and in all other practical aspects, with the provision that the investigators shall report their conclusions to the Congress at the earliest possible date, but without recommendations as to legislative action, in order that the public may learn from an unprejudiced source just what actual developments have ensued.

Fourth, explicit approval by the Congress of the consideration by the Interstate Commerce Commission of an increase of freight rates to meet such additional expenditures by the railroads as may have been rendered necessary by the adoption of the eight-hour day and which have not been offset by administrative readjustments and economies, should the facts disclosed justify the increase.

Fifth, an amendment of the existing Federal statute which provides for the mediation, conciliation, and arbitration of such controversies as the present by adding to it a provision that in case the methods of accommodation now provided for should fail, a full public investigation of the merits of every such dispute shall be instituted and completed before a strike or lockout may lawfully be attempted.

And, sixth, the lodgment in the hands of the Executive of the power, in case of military necessity, to take control of such portions and such rolling stock of the railways of the country as may be required for military use and to operate them for military purposes, with authority to draft into the military service of the United States such train crews and administrative officials as the circumstances require for their safe and efficent use.

Mr. THOMAS. The President did not ask the members of his own party, then controlling the Senate, to enact the principle of the Adamson bill alone; he asked for the enactment of the entire six provisions, and the Senate Democratic steering committee by unanimous vote, upon my motion, agreed to his request and to consider them practically as one piece of legislation. But we did not do so.

The Adamson bill was enacted. We adjourned as soon thereafter as possible and took chances with the next Congress upon the others. Why? Because a presidential election was pending, and being human politicians, just like our friends on the other side, we concluded to follow the good old New Testament doctrine, and we said to ourselves, "We will go our way, and at a more convenient season will call up these bills." But we never did, with the result that the Adamson bill became law, and nobody from that date to this has heard of, much less had the audacity to attempt to secure the enactment of, the other five proposals, thus justifying in some degree the reproach that the Congress surrendered its judgment to a severe situation.

Mr. SMOOT. We will enact them before the next election, perhaps.

Mr. THOMAS. No, I think not; because, unfortunately, we of both parties are now legislating very largely with a view to capturing the next President at the approaching election. That is human nature, and there is nothing new about it. We are doing it; all parties do it; and under our form of government they all will continue to do it. I was opposed to class legislation in the days when the corporations had their innings. I am opposed to it now. Hence, whatever else may be said of my attitude, I can not be charged with inconsistency.

Mr. President, I am afraid Congress sowed the wind in the class legislation of the past; I earnestly hope that we may not reap the whirlwind, but I am not at all sanguine of the immediate outlook before the American Nation.

Some of us in the good old times were rash enough to predict some of the consequences of class legislation. They were reflected in the attitude of the union man to the nonunion man. The day that the individual citizen was denied the right to work when he pleased and how he pleased and as he pleased, that day we struck a fundamental blow at American institutions, for that is the primal basis of freedom. Its denial has necessarily led to the expansion of unions, loyalty to which is stronger than loyalty to the Government of the United States. So far has this principle gone that Government employees—National, State, and municipal—are not only permitted but are encouraged to organize and affiliate with the general federations. They are doing it in Great Britain. The police forces of the country, whose duty it is to preserve the law and protect the individual, to make arrests, to preserve and enforce peace, are organizing and affiliating with federations which in times of stress will demand and receive their adhesion, although it may directly transgress their obligations to the public.

I hold in my hand a telegram, dated August 2, giving an account of the looting, rioting, destruction, incendiarism, and bloodshed in the great city of Liverpool, the second municipality in the British Isles, all because the policemen have gone on a strike and left that great city and its inhabitants to the tender mercies of the thieves, harlots, cutthroats, and murderers, who are prompt and swift to take advantage of such conditions when permitted so to do. We are not exempt from such conditions. I saw an account a few days ago of a strike of policemen in the city of Chicago; and it is history that at Winnipeg the police force struck with other proponents of a big union and left the city practically at the mercy of the rabble, requiring the Canadian authorities to throw their troops into the community as rapidly as possible. This morning's dispatches announce that the military forces in Liverpool have been compelled to shoot the mob down, and units of the British Navy have been ordered into the harbor to protect the merchant shipping anchored in that harbor and unable to leave for lack of service.

Mr. President, we are face to face with a demand—not a request, but a demand—on the part of something like 600,000 employees, first, that we give them $800,000,000 at once, which confessedly will not help them at all—and they propose to suspend the operation of our great transportation systems until we do—second, to reduce the cost of living; and, third, to pass the Plumb bill, and by that means take over $20,000,000,000 worth of property and operate it under Government ownership according to a system provided by that bill.

Now, Mr. President, just what does this mean? This is the Senate of the United States. The House is at the other end of the Capitol. Combined we represent one of the great departments of the Government. Every Member has taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, which requires him to legislate in accordance with the provisions of that instrument as he understands them. We are the delegates of the people, sent here for a specific purpose; and legislation necessarily carries with it a power of judgment. This, I think, is the first time in the history of the Nation—I hope it is, and God grant it may be the last, although I fear it may not be—in which a fragment of the American people, fully organized and in control of industries vital to the public welfare, has pointed its finger to the Congress of the United States and said, "Legislate thus and so," failing to do which, in the language of one of them, "We will tie up the system so that it can never operate again"; and ours is the responsibility right now of giving answer to that demand, whatever the consequence may be to us, for there can be no consequence quite as serious as that which will inevitably result from yielding to such a demand, since it will be followed by others until we shall simply be here, like the French assembly during the Revolution, finally to do the bidding of the throngs in the gallery or be mobbed and butchered if we refuse. It means an end, Mr. President, of representative government. Let us not flinch the issue. If I am not right in my conclusion, I want to be corrected. There are Senators upon the floor of vastly more legislative experience than I, many better acquainted with republican institutions, their history, and the history of nations which have risen, matured, and fallen. If that is not the result of this demand, Mr. President, I want to be corrected. If it is, what does our duty require of us?

I think this question, Mr. President, is quite as pregnant with importance as any treaty between this country and other nations possibly can be.

Now, Mr. President, I do not want to be extreme in my statements, and particularly since the honorable chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce has requested us to be temperate in our discussion of this serious problem, and yet I can not in my mind characterize a threat like this from Government employees to tie up and paralyze the great distributing system of the country, and by that means bring ruin and wreck and misery to all classes and conditions of men unless we accept their mandate and do their bidding, as short of treason. It would be bad enough if it came from those who are not employees of the Government; it is inexcusable in them.

Mr. President, some years ago, when public excitement ran high in the State of New York because of the arrogant aggressions of the New York Central Railroad, then defying both National and State laws and regulations, Mr. Vanderbilt was interviewed regarding his attitude. His reply was, "The public be damned!" and with that statement he sealed the fate of the agitation then progressing. The other day, in the city of Chicago, at a meeting of the organized employees of the city railroads, one of the leaders who had been appointed to negotiate a settlement, and who had succeeded, made an effort to explain the details of the agreement to the assembly, but was howled down. He then managed to say, "Gentlemen, you are not fighting the owners of the roads; you are fighting the public"; and the reply instantly came back, "The public be damned!"

Please tell me, Senators, the difference between the two situations if you can, each with the same watchword, and that watchword truly expressive of the attitude of those announcing it.

Mr. McCUMBER. The answer is, Mr. President, the difference in the number of votes.

Mr. THOMAS. The difference is not only in the number of votes, but it is in the terrible effectiveness with which that sentiment may be carried out through the collective strength of the individuals as opposed in the other case to the collective strength of capital. In other words, it is the more dangerous of the two, if there is any difference whatever.

There are 110,000,000 people in the United States, according to the last estimates. Six hundred thousand men are identified with this movement. That is to say, less than 1 per cent of our population proposes to take this mighty Nation by the throat and starve and beat it into submission to its demands.

Now, these demands may be perfectly fair, perfectly just, and I may vote for them after final consideration, but never under such circumstances; and I am wondering if the old spirit of Americanism, which was the mainstay of the United States during the American Revolution, that spirit which has represented Anglo-Saxonism for centuries, has become so dormant, so sluggish, so stagnant, that it will submit to this situation, and leave the Congress of the United States to meet this demand bereft of its mighty influence. If so, the United States is not worth saving. Its salt hath lost its savor, and nothing remains except that slow process of decay which has characterized the fate of many great nations of the past.

For my part, if this country's mission is to be closed, I prefer a swift to a lingering process. If this Nation, freighted with the destiny of all humankind and based upon the eternal principle of liberty regulated by law, has run its course, then let the end come as quickly as possible.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator interpret these two demands of labor as being concurrent; and does he take the position that it is proposed to strike and maintain a strike until Congress enacts this legislation for the transfer of the railroad properties to the Government?

Mr. THOMAS. Not if we comply with the first demand, which is for this increase of about 35 per cent in wages.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I was unable to get the Senator's idea. It seems to me that the opening paragraph of this article published this morning indicates that the labor organizations intend to appeal to the American people, and to make that the issue of the next campaign; that they do not propose to strike for the purpose of securing legislation, but that the strike is limited to a demand for more wages. I just wanted to clarify that.

Mr. THOMAS. Well, it is possible that my conception of this situation is overdrawn. But we must take the conditions with the announcement. There are nearly 300,000 men on strike now; the affiliated unions of clerks, and so forth, have announced their adhesion to the principle, and their determination to do likewise if necessary, and the calling of a referendum for the purpose of arming the authorities with the power to declare a strike, I think for the 2d of September, must have reference to the demanded legislation, because the other demand is for instant action with regard to the increase of wages; and yesterday the President of the United States was hurrying to and fro over the city in consultation with the heads of bureaus because of the emergency presented by these conditions, which he felt it his duty to avoid if possible.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Are the 300,000 men whom the Senator says are on strike now in the employ of the Government?

Mr. THOMAS. Why, they certainly were. I made that statement a few minutes ago.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. They are railway employees, necessarily in the employ of the Government.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Of course, the Senator does not take the position that if this issue is made one for the next campaign, and the people of the United States decide in favor of making this change, that would subvert the liberties of the United States?

Mr. THOMAS. That is another proposition. I have several times commended the manner in which the people of North Dakota have changed their form of government. They have done it through constitutional, regular methods. We are a Nation of majorities; and if a majority of the people of the United States at the polls say that we must seize the railroads and operate them as Government property, so be it. That is a different proposition.

I need not picture to the Senate what the tying up of the railroad system means. Senators talk about the high cost of living. Mr. President, this threatened strike will not only double it, it will quadruple it. It will work, to use a common expression, "both ends against the middle." In the first place, the productive energies of the country will be paralyzed, and in the next place the difficulty of transportation, the impossibility, perhaps, of transportation, necessarily leads to a rise in prices of the necessities of life mountain high. Then, too, the unemployed will increase by hundreds of thousands. They will be consumers only. Not only so, the strike leads to revolution, it leads to insurrection, it means turning loose upon the devoted people of this country—the great middle classes—all of those discontented forces now seething and boiling under the surface; and I very much question whether there is any power in the United States that can stem the tide, unless the Americans of the country—and I do not confine that expression to the native born, but include all men with the American spirit—shall gird on their armor and with one voice say to this movement, "Thus far shalt thou go, and no farther."

Only the other day the papers announced the organization of a fifth great packing industry—the allied packers. I forget what the capitalization is, but it is very large. I could not but think, Mr. President, that that was flaunting a red flag in the face of public opinion. But there are some people in the world who never learn even from experience, who are unconscious of the dangers which confront them until it is too late to avoid them.

It is a coincidence that this morning's paper publishes the first authorized interview with Nikolai Lenin, who outlines the Bolshevik policy. He states that the first aim is to drive Americans and Japanese from Siberia.

Revolution, not reform, is the Bolshevik program.
The Bolsheviks seek to overthrow all landowners and capitalists.
They propose to organize the workers of the world, Americans included, into a single fraternal union.
The Bolsheviks will crush all resistance, using terror if necessary.

Mr. President, is there not a parallel in that announcement with the present situation? If not a complete one, does it not at least suggest the parallel operation of the two? The first step is an assault upon property. I care not whether that property was improperly obtained or dishonestly obtained or what not, it is an assault upon property. If granted, the next step will be the nationalization of coal mines and other mines, then taking over all the land of the country, including the farms, and the property held by the members of these organizations, which up to this time I have always regarded as the very élite of organized labor, men of property, men of standing, men of character, men of education, men composing unions equipped with means, with buildings and all the accessories of modern equipment.

They are digging away the foundations of their own prosperity, if this movement succeeds. I do not believe they are Bolshevists. God knows, I do not want to so charge any man. But does not this mistaken policy unconsciously lead to the very things for which Bolshevism is said to stand? Is it not receiving the encouragement of every person bolshevistically inclined in the United States? Is it not just what the I. W. W. has been preaching and desiring—direct action? It is easy to start revolution, Mr. President, but oh, how difficult to impose limitations upon its progress. Once we begin on this course the time is not far distant when there will be such a revolution as may shake the very foundations of the civil structure, return the world to that medievalism from which the human race so slowly and painfully emerged.

I sometimes wonder whether in the not distant future you gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber, and you gentlemen on this side of the Chamber, may not find your combined strength of patriotism and of courage essential to the salvation of the country both sides love so dearly. I hope not, for there is nothing so healthy in free government, nor so necessary, as vigorous and opposing political parties watching, criticizing, and exposing each the errors of the other. But unfortunately for years instead of doing this we have been engaging in a mad race to see which could get the most votes, by dispensation of patronage, of money, and of privilege, and this crisis is one of the consequences which, I greatly fear, many of us have doubtless foreseen.

Mr. President, I had not intended to occupy the attention of the Senate as long as I have done, but this is a tremendous situation, a situation which we could not avoid if we would, which in the exercise and discharge of our duties we must face, however unpleasant or inevitable the consequences. And we can do but one thing—stand fast for the right and the prerogatives of the Congress. We have waged a war costing more in money and men than all the wars of the previous century combined, and for what purpose, among others? To make the world safe for democracy. Mr. President, the task of this generation is to make democracy safe for the world, to make democracy intelligent and fit to govern, to make democracy conscious of the eternal fact that there can be no liberty which does not respect the rights of all men. It is as true to-day as it ever was that "the thing that hath been, it is that which shall be, and that which is done is that which shall be done; and there is no new thing under the sun."

ADJOURNMENT TO THURSDAY.

Mr. LODGE. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Thursday.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 58 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Thursday, August 7, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, August 5, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father in heaven, with pitying love look upon Thy weak, erring, sinful children and by the wisdom, power, and goodness Thou has bestowed upon us lead us back to the simple life, when home was home and communities governed themselves in accordance with the laws of the land.

Let the self-appointed, who are passing up and down the land with their fine theories, stop talking and do things worth while, and thus teach by example, fair play, even-handed justice, and righteousness to their neighbors, and thus lead us out of the terrible tangle in which we find ourselves to harmony and peace.

It is easy to put our shortcomings and sins on a personal devil; but selfishness is the devil which has wrought havoc and brought sin into the world. Help us to cast it out and live like men under the laws Thou hast ordained. In His name. Amen.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I think we ought to have a quorum here to-day, and I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point that there is no quorum present.

THE JOURNAL.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, should not the Journal be read first? Is the point of no quorum in order before the Journal is read?

The SPEAKER. The point of no quorum is in order at any time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw temporarily.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws it temporarily. The Clerk will read the Journal of Saturday.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, August 2, 1919, was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 2594. An act to extend the time for the construction of the Broadway Street Bridge across the Arkansas River between the cities of Little Rock and Argenta, Ark.; and

S. 2595. An act to extend the time for the construction of the Main Street Bridge across the Arkansas River between the cities of Little Rock and Argenta, Ark.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 3854. An act for the repeal of the daylight-saving law.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. OSBORNE, to participate in the welcoming ceremonies to the Pacific Fleet at Los Angeles, Calif.;

To Mr. FOSTER, at the request of Mr. WALSH, for four days, on account of illness in his family;

To Mr. LUHRING, for 10 days, on account of business;

To Mr. SINNOTT, indefinitely, on account of illness in his family; and

To Mr. YATES, for five days, on account of important business.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. IGOE rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri rise?

Mr. IGOE. I rise to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of——

Mr. FORDNEY rose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] to make a report.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I present a report from the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. IGOE. I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. IGOE. On Saturday I made two objections to the request made by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. I stated my reasons for the objections. Later on in the day the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], the minority leader, preferred a request for the present consideration of the resolution which I tried to secure the consideration of, and after having submitted the request to the House the Speaker subsequently refused to put the request. After the House adjourned there was considerable confusion here, and the newspapers throughout the country, including several in my own State and one in New York that my attention was called to, said that the Speaker, in explaining his action, said that he "did not intend that one man, meaning IGOE, should bulldoze the House." I think that is an unwarranted and an unjustifiable characterization of my attitude on Saturday, and I think it presents a question of personal privilege.

Mr. Speaker, I introduced two resolutions last week——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I think we ought to have a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make the point?

Mr. MONDELL. I trust the gentleman will withhold that point.

Mr. BLANTON. I understood that the gentleman from Wyoming had a request that he desired to present.

Mr. MONDELL. I propose to present a unanimous-consent request as soon as I have an opportunity.

Mr. BLANTON. I withdraw it for the present, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, these resolutions that I submitted, one of them directing an investigation by the Committee on Ways and Means and the other requesting the Trade Commission to make an investigation into the price of shoes——

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Missouri is not discussing a matter of personal privilege by referring to what he might have done in the way of introducing resolutions.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman just stated his question of personal privilege, and that is that the Speaker of the House is reported to have said he would not permit one man, meaning the gentleman from Missouri, to bulldoze the House of Representatives. The gentleman from Missouri is explaining the situation, to show that he was not undertaking to bulldoze the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. IGOE. I ask the Speaker to rule whether or not I have presented a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. Inasmuch as the matter affects what the Speaker is reported to have said, the Speaker, of course, is going to be very liberal and will hold that it is a matter of personal privilege.

Mr. IGOE. I just wanted to explain to the House why these resolutions were offered. Prior to the offering of them I suggested that they might be considered in the House without being referred to committees, and that request was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Had the gentleman ever suggested that to the Chair?

Mr. IGOE. "The gentleman" spoke to the Speaker and the majority leader of the House before the resolutions were introduced.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not aware that the gentleman spoke to him about it, although the Chair may be mistaken.

Mr. IGOE. And the resolutions were introduced and referred to two committees. The Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee reported the resolution, requesting the Federal Trade Commission to make an investigation of the prices of shoes. It was placed on the calendar and reported by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON]. When the resolution was introduced the House had already agreed to take a five weeks' recess, and I was very anxious that the resolution should be reported and consideration had before we adjourned Saturday night. It was not my intention in any way to deprive the Members of the House of their recess.

Subsequently, the President sent a message to the Speaker and the House rescinded its recess agreement. I then endeavored to get this resolution called up and get the attention of the gentleman in charge of the bill before consulting with the majority leader. The resolution was not called up. It was said that we could wait until later on. Then the gentleman from Wyoming presented this adjournment resolution, to which I objected. I stated on each occasion why I objected. All I asked from the House at any time was the privilege of asking unanimous consent, or that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] might ask unanimous consent, for the consideration of the resolution. If any Member had objected, I stated privately that would end my effort with the House, and I would again appeal to the Rules Committee for a rule for the consideration at some other time.

I never intended or attempted to bulldoze the House into doing anything, except I did use my right and privilege as a Member of the House to secure consideration of the resolution which I thought of some interest to my constituents.

I was told after I made the first objection that I could not get it considered. I was told after the second objection by Members on the other side that I never would get anything in this House.

Now, I think in view of my action and my conduct in trying to get consideration of this resolution I was doing no more than my duty as a Member of the House. It was a simple resolution. I did not want to take up the time of the House in discussing it, but simply wanted to present it to the House, and if any Member objected, that would end the matter. It seems to me it is unfair and an unjust characterization of my conduct to say that I was trying to bulldoze the House. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that the statement of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE] is a very serious one, but I do not wish to be discourteous, as the gentleman from Missouri knows that our relations have always been entirely pleasant and I will reply to him. The reason I did not wish to recognize the gentleman was this: A proposition was made to the House to adjourn for three days which, I believed, represented the wishes of an overwhelming majority of the House. I do not remember that the gentleman from Missouri ever spoke to me about his resolution, but there were other gentlemen who had spoken to me about legislation that they were very anxious to bring up. They were matters that I thoroughly approved of, as I do the resolution of the gentleman from Missouri. The other gentlemen were willing that the great majority of the House should have its will and that an agreement should be made, and then take their chance on unanimous consent being given. The gentleman from Missouri was the only one who was not willing to allow the majority of the House to have its will and then take his chance, but he insisted that the majority of the House should not have its will unless he first had his will.

I did not think that that was the proper attitude for any Member to take, because if one man should there is no reason why other men should not. One Member has just as much right as another, and it seemed to me that he was not entitled to be recognized in that attitude in preference to other Members. It seemed to me that the majority of the House should have their will, and no Member should say that he will obstruct the wish of the majority unless he is first allowed his way.

I do not remember exactly what I said. I did not use the expression he objects to in the chair. It may be that I did after the House adjourned—that I did not think the gentleman ought to be allowed to bulldoze the House. That expresses, in not very elegant language, the general feeling I had and which I have now stated. [Applause on the Republican side.] It was not anything against the resolution; it was simply the tactics by which the gentleman sought to enforce, regardless of the equal rights of others and the will of the House, his personal wishes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. By what authority or right did the Speaker refuse Saturday to put my request for unanimous consent after he had recognized me and after he had started to put it and as a matter of fact did put it? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GILLETT. As I recollect, the gentleman asked that the gentleman from Missouri, his colleague [Mr. IGOE], be allowed to ask unanimous consent to have his resolution considered, and it was that the Chair objected to. But then the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] knows perfectly well—I have heard him many times, after he had recognized a gentleman, say that he did not recognize him for a particular purpose.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But the Speaker recognized me and put the question.

Mr. GILLETT. I do not remember, but perhaps I did.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will read him what happened.

Mr. GILLETT. But the gentleman that I did not intend to recognize was not the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. CLARK, but the other gentleman from Missouri, Mr. IGOE, to present his unanimous request, and, as I recollect, the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. CLARK, asked consent that the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. IGOE, might present his request.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will refresh the gentleman's memory, reading from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 3586:

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the Igoe resolution about boots and shoes.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution about boots and shoes. Is there objection?

There the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] intervened with a reservation of the right to object, and after he and I had had a short confab, he seemed to be satisfied and sat down. At any rate, he did not object.

Mr. GILLETT. But it strikes me that Mr. ANDERSON did object. I am just reading what he says here.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. He reserved the right to object. I will read the whole thing.

Mr. GILLETT. Yes; I am just reading it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri (reading)—

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if we have to agree to every resolution anybody wants to pass in order to get this recess I think we had better not have the recess.
Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Nobody is asking for but one resolution.

Mr. GILLETT. Does not the gentleman from Missouri think that is an objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not.

Mr. GILLETT. I should say it was.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Chair never announced any objection. I continue:

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Nobody is asking for but one resolution.
The SPEAKER. The Chair declines to recognize the gentleman for the present.

Mr. GILLETT. The Chair certainly has a right to do that.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Not after the Chair had recognized me. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GILLETT. I think the gentleman will admit that he is mistaken in a moment. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] reserved the right to object.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. Then the Chair certainly had the right to object, and he declined to recognize the gentleman.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the Chair had stated that he himself had objection, there would have been no mystery about it.

Mr. GILLETT. The only issue is that the Chair refused to recognize the gentleman instead of objecting. But refusing to recognize the gentleman is exactly the same thing, as the gentleman from Missouri well knows.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the gentleman say that he, as the occupant of the chair, objected himself?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly. I think it was well understood on Saturday night that I objected and refused to recognize the gentleman.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know it was well understood that you had refused to put the motion after you had started to put it once.

Mr. GILLETT. Exactly; and that is equivalent to objection.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Let me continue to read from the RECORD:

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Nobody is asking for but one resolution.
The SPEAKER. The Chair declines to recognize the gentleman for the present.

You had no right to decline.

Mr. GILLETT. Did not the Chair have the right to object—to decline to recognize the gentleman?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Chair had the right to object if the Chair had done what any other Member of the House does on such an occasion and said, "I object."

Mr. GILLETT. I submit that it is simply a matter of form, and there is where I differ with the gentleman. The Chair always has the right to refuse to recognize gentlemen for unanimous consent, which is equivalent to an objection.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But the trouble is you had already recognized me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentlemen will not address each other in the second person. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Surely the temporary occupant of the chair is entirely correct in that.

Mr. GILLETT. Then in order that there be no misunderstanding I will now state that I did then, in refusing to recognize the gentleman, mean to object.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The trouble about that is that you had already recognized me.

Mr. GILLETT. But objection had been made, and then I had the right to refuse to recognize the gentleman further.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will ask the gentleman from Massachusetts who made the objection?

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman from Missouri had read the reservation of objection by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But the RECORD does not show that.

Mr. GILLETT. It shows that he reserved the right to object.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is one thing, and an objection is another.

Mr. GILLETT. But when one Member reserves the right to object, another Member has the right to continue the objection.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know; but the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] had taken his seat and was quiescent.

Mr. GILLETT. But the reservation still held, and the Chair had the right——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. To continue the reading:

The SPEAKER. The Chair declines to recognize the gentleman for the present.
Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, regular order.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands the regular order.
Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The regular order is putting my request.

The SPEAKER. But the Chair did not recognize the gentleman.
Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Did not recognize me?
The SPEAKER. The Chair did not recognize the gentleman from Missouri.

But the RECORD shows he did.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him there?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. Let us straighten things out as we go along. The Chair did recognize the gentleman from Missouri, and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] reserved the right to object; and after that the Chair, having the same right as any other Member, refused to recognize the gentleman further, which was objecting.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I read further from the RECORD:

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What went with the request I made that the gentleman from Missouri could call up his resolution?
The SPEAKER. The Chair is not obliged to state it unless he desires.
Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I understand that.
The SPEAKER. The Chair did not recognize the gentleman to present a request.

The trouble about it was he had recognized me.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Did the Chair recognize me or not?
The SPEAKER. The Chair recognized the gentleman.

That is I.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And I made the request.
The SPEAKER. The Chair is not obliged to recognize the gentleman to prefer a request——

But the trouble was he had already done it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, my understanding was——
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] is recognized.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. Of course, the Speaker could not object to the request until the request was made. The Speaker is not a mind reader. He could not know what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] was going to ask.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why, the very first thing I did was to make the request for unanimous consent for the consideration of the Igoe resolution.

Mr. ANDERSON. "The gentleman from Minnesota" reserved the right to object.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is true.

Mr. ANDERSON. After I had reserved the right to object, the Speaker used his right to object by refusing to recognize the gentleman further.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It was too late. He had no earthly right to object to my request after he had put it once, and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] intervened and got up the whole racket; and then after he and I had some kind of a confab he sat down and was quiescent and did not object, and I say that the ruling was an outrage. [Applause.]

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I suppose I would have just as much right to rise to a question of privilege as the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. IGOE, to that last remark of my friend from Missouri, Mr. CLARK, but I do not resent it at all. The question now simmers itself down simply to this one question, that the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. CLARK, says I did not have the right not to recognize him after having once recognized him. I submit to the House these facts: I recognized him, the gentleman preferred his request for unanimous consent, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] reserved the right to object.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The gentleman leaves out one link, and that is that the Speaker put my question.

Mr. GILLETT. Yes, I put the question; and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] reserved the right to object, which gave any Member of this House, including the Speaker, the right to object, and immediately after that the ex-Speaker [Mr. CLARK of Missouri] again asked permission, and then the Chair said:

The Chair declines to recognize the gentleman for the present—which is equivalent to objecting, and, as far as I know, the Speaker never says "I object." The Speaker always expresses his objection by refusing to recognize a gentleman. It is a very small matter, a mere matter of phraseology, but I am willing to accept the burden and to say that by saying "the Chair refuses to recognize the gentleman" I intended to object; and for the reason that I have stated before, not from any personal feeling toward the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE], not from any objection to his resolution, but because I did not like the attempt of one gentleman to obtain rights that other gentlemen were foregoing.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the Speaker entertains the intention to object himself, he ought to state it and say, "I object."

Mr. GILLETT. I never heard of a Speaker doing that.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion which occurs to me, that this colloquy illustrates the advisability of one custom that Mr. Speaker CANNON always insisted upon, for which we criticized him a good deal, but that finally the ex-Speaker [Mr. CLARK of Missouri] was compelled to adopt, and that was to ask each Member when he rises, "For what purpose does the gentleman rise?"

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Of course, that is true.

Mr. GARNER. They tried to avoid it, but it is absolutely essential.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the House will bear with me, I tried to get rid of that for two or three weeks after I was elected Speaker.

Mr. GARNER. I know the gentleman did.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But it got the House into such a tremendous muddle that out of self-defense and for the good of the House I had to go back to the habit of asking, "For what purpose does the gentleman rise?" Will you allow me one more remark? The gentleman from Massachusetts, the late Mr. Gardner, always insisted there were two recognitions. Mr. Gardner was a high-class parliamentarian, and he insisted that when a Member addressed the Chair and the Chair says "The gentleman from Missouri," that is one recognition; and then, according to Mr. Gardner's theory, the second recognition was that when the gentleman stated his purpose in rising the Chair recognized him or refused to recognize him for that purpose, and that, he said, was the second recognition.

Mr. GARNER. I think that is a good plan.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, that strikes me as logical, and I think it is probably wise, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] suggests, to ask for what purpose a gentleman rises, and the Chair does that very often; but when the leader of the minority rises, the Chair generally recognizes him without putting that question, because he knows that the leader of the minority has a sense of responsibility and is familiar with the rules, and the Chair knows that he would not intend to take advantage of his recognition. So the Chair many times recognizes him when he would not recognize other gentlemen without making the inquiry; but I agree that perhaps it is wise that the Chair should always ask that question. Most Members on both sides of the House who wish to make a motion out of the regular order consult the Speaker in advance and then it is arranged whether and when they can be recognized so as least to interfere with the regular business of the House.

The SPEAKER resumed the chair.

PROPOSED MEETINGS ON TUESDAYS AND FRIDAYS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a unanimous-consent request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming will present it.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn until Friday, and from Friday until the following Tuesday, and so on, meeting two days in the week, Tuesday and Friday, until Members are notified by the majority and minority leaders of the necessity of a quorum; that during the period prior to such notice no business be transacted except the prayer, the reading of the Journal, the signing of bills on the Speaker's table, the reference of matters on the Speaker's table, and the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request made?

Mr. MONDELL. I want to say in that connection, Mr. Speaker, that if my request is granted there can be no assurance that the request for a quorum will not come in about two weeks from to-day. Of course, I have no definite information on which to base that opinion or belief, but I think that Members, if this agreement is entered into, leaving for their homes should have the understanding that they may be called back in two weeks. I should confer from time to time with the minority leader, and should issue the call whenever agreed on between us, or whenever in the opinion of the minority leader, there should be a quorum present. Further, Mr. Speaker, if this consent is granted, I shall hope that the House continue in session for a short time to-day for the presentation of matters by uanimous consent only.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will this interfere with the introduction of bills?

Mr. MONDELL. It would not.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to know whether if that arrangement goes through it will exclude the presentation of bills, resolutions, and petitions?

Mr. MONDELL. No; not at all.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. MONDELL. I should expect the House to remain in session a short time to-day, as there are several matters that gentleman wish to present by unanimous consent, or ask unanimous consent to present, and one or two gentlemen who would like to address the House for a short time.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, are we to understand during these three-day recesses that the committees having jurisdiction of the matters to which the attention of Congress was called in the President's letter to the gentleman and Mr. ESCH will be considering such matters?

Mr. MONDELL. The unanimous-consent request is largely predicated upon the fact—and I think the gentleman from North Carolina will agree with me that it is a fact—that the committees having the more important questions before them for consideration, questions that are now most interesting the country, will make much better progress with their work and be able to present their findings and conclusions to the House more promptly and in better form if they are not delayed in their work by the requirement of constant attendance upon the sessions of the House.

Mr. KITCHIN. I agree with the gentleman, but I desired it to go in the RECORD that these committees will be considering these questions in the meantime.

Mr. MONDELL. These temporary adjournments are with a view and for the purpose of enabling the committees of the House, a number of which have very important matters before them, to give their constant and undivided attention to those matters in the hope and the expectation that they will be sooner prepared to present them to the House for its consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Wednesday, August 6, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, August 6, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father which are in heaven, hallowed be Thy name.

Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven.

Give us this day our daily bread.

And forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors.

And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil: For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever. Amen.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to have a quorum here. We ought to go to work or ought to quit. I make the point of no quorum.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Division, Mr. Speaker.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, August 7, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we recognize Thy hand in the life of our Nation and Thy guidance through the years. In the great crisis through which we have passed Thou hast been our guide. Thou hast defended and protected us. Thou art with us to-day. In the midst of the turmoil and strife of the world Thou art with us. We can trust in Thy grace. To-day we come asking that Thou wilt enter not only into the great currents of our Nation's life but into our own individual lives, bringing us the thought and purpose of subjection to Thy will guiding us in the performance of every duty. We ask it for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday last, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

JOINT MEETING OF THE TWO HOUSES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, which will be read.

The Secretary read the communication, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, 6 August, 1919.

MY DEAR MR. VICE PRESIDENT: I have had under very serious consideration the proper action of the Government with reference to the high cost of living, and feel it my duty to address a joint session of Congress at the earliest possible moment to present certain recommendations now ready for submission to Congress.

I sincerely hope, therefore, that you can arrange for a joint session for Friday afternoon next at 4 o'clock, if that hour is agreeable to the two Houses.

Cordially and sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

Hon. THOMAS R. MARSHALL,
Vice President.

Mr. FLETCHER. I presume the practice is for a resolution to be agreed to in the House and sent to the Senate, or should the Senate take action now?

Mr. SMOOT. There is not any question but that a resolution will be acted upon in the House to-day, and it will be sent to the Senate to be acted upon here.

PURCHASE OF MILITARY SUPPLIES (S. DOC. NO. 65).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of February 29, 1919, a list of all commissioned officers in the Army and of all other persons who, since the declaration of war, have been authorized to purchase supplies for the use of the Military Establishment, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

WAR DEPARTMENT FILMS AND MOTION PICTURE CAMERAS (S. DOC. NO. 54, PT. 2).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 26th ultimo, a report of photographic equipment under the control of the Chief Signal Officer, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolutions:

H. R. 5032. An act to extend the franchise in the parishes and separate congregations of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the District of Columbia;

H. J. Res. 163. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of Labor to lease the Charleston immigration station and dock connected therewith; and

H. J. Res. 165. Joint resolution to allow the payment of bills lawfully incurred for construction work actually performed or construction material actually purchased and delivered prior to the approval of an act approved July 11, 1919 (Public, No. 7, 66th Cong., H. R. 5227).

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a petition of the Ohio State Good Government Club, praying that an appropriation be made to make the Postal Service financially attractive and that the man power of the Post Office Department shall equal the demands of the Postal Service, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask to have a telegram from James A. Pearce, of Fort Worth, Tex., read for the information of the Senate.

There being no objection, the telegram was read, as follows:

CHICAGO, August 5, 1919.

United States Senator GRONNA,
Washington, D. C.:

How can you reduce the cost of living without reducing wages? I pay $90 per month and board on the farm for men who will only work nine hours. The retail dealers are robbing the public and labor is making the cost of production very high. The sender of this message is a farmer. I lost $5,000 last year on account of drought and high labor. I will lose almost double the amount this year.

JAMES A. PEARCE,
Fort Worth, Tex.

Mr. STERLING. I present resolutions adopted at a recent State convention of the American Legion of the Department of South Dakota, held at Sioux Falls, S. Dak., requesting the passage of the bill providing for the building of homes, reclamation of lands, and other substantial aid to soldiers, sailors, and marines seeking to establish themselves in the world after discharge. I move that the resolutions be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KNOX presented a petition of sundry citizens of London Grove, Pa., and a petition of sundry citizens of Troop, Pa., praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of Pomona Grange No. 68, Patrons of Husbandry, of Lehigh and Northampton Counties, Pa., praying for the repeal of the present conscription act after the signing of peace, and also for the enrollment of troops for overseas service by voluntary enlistment only, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented petitions of Local Division No. 85, Amalgamated Association Street and Electric Railway Employees of America, of Pittsburgh; of the Society of Friends of Irish Freedom, of Wayne; and of Patrick Ford Branch, Friends of Irish Freedom, of Philadelphia, all in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the independence of Ireland, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Coatesville, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the enforcement of war-time and national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Washington township, Clarion County, Pa., remonstrating against the imposition of a tariff on potash imported into the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PAGE presented a petition of the Grafton-Orange Association of Congregational Churches and Ministers, praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FERNALD presented a petition of sundry citizens of Bangor, Me., and a petition of sundry citizens of Orono, Me., praying for the repeal of the tax on ice cream, soda, soft drinks, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CAPPER presented a telegram in the nature of a memorial from the Farm Bureau of McPherson County, Kans., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation which may interfere with the free working of the law of supply and demand and tend to place the price of wheat and foodstuffs below the cost of production, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a telegram in the nature of a memorial from Local Branch, Post Office Clerks and Letter Carriers' Association, of Kansas City, Kans., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation that will bring relief in salary schedules to but certain classes of postal employees and praying for equitable relief to all employees of the Postal Service, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a petition of the Credit Men's Association, of Detroit, Mich., praying for the establishment of a budget system, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a petition of Maple Hill Grange No. 691, Patrons of Husbandry, of Central Lake, Mich., praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Mount Clemens, Mich., and a petition of sundry citizens of Los Angeles, Calif., praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Vandalia, Jones, and White Pigeon, all in the State of Michigan, remonstrating against universal military training, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of Lombard Post No. 170, Grand Army of the Republic, of Petoskey, Mich., praying for an increase in the pensions of Civil War veterans and widows of deceased Civil War veterans, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of Local Grange No. 16, Patrons of Husbandry, of Houlton, Me., and a petition of Local Grange No. 12, Patrons of Husbandry, of Farmington, Me., praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of Roofers' Local Union No. 21, of Los Angeles, Calif., praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MOSES presented a petition of sundry citizens of Meredith, N. H., and a petition of sundry citizens of Exeter, N. H., praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FLETCHER presented a petition of Local Union No. 1010, Brotherhood of Painters, Decorators, and Paperhangers of America, of Orlando, Fla., praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS.

Mr. PAGE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1447) to correct the naval record of Fred C. Konrad, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 143) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 2088) for the relief of Lieut. Commander Jerome E. Morse, United States Navy, retired, submitted an adverse report (No. 144) thereon, which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred the following bills, reported adversely thereon, and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 169) for the retirement of certain naval officers; and

A bill (S. 1672) to amend the act of August 29, 1916.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. WADSWORTH:

A bill (S. 2735) to dissolve and distribute the assets of the Colored Union Benevolent Association and settle its affairs (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. STERLING:

A bill (S. 2736) granting a pension to Mary J. Robb (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. PITTMAN:

A bill (S. 2737) granting a pension to Joseph Danielson; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

A bill (S. 2738) granting a pension to Charles C. Chadwick (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

REDUCTION OF EXPENDITURES AND TAXES.

Mr. McCORMICK. I submit a resolution to the end that the cost of government and the sum of taxation may be reduced. I ask that it may be read and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The resolution (S. Res. 155) was read and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, as follows:

Resolved, That in submitting estimates for the next fiscal year for the expenses of the Government the President is hereby requested to submit to Congress, not later than December 1, 1919, a statement showing:

First. Such reduction of the estimates for expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921 (exclusive of estimates for the national defense, pensions, and war insurance), as will permit a reduction of taxes by the sum of at least $1,000,000,000 annually.

Second. The annual receipts of the Government from all sources for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1910, to June 30, 1919, inclusive, together with an estimate of the revenues and income from all sources for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1920, and 1921, respectively.

Third. The annual expenditures of the Government for all purposes for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1910, to June 30, 1919, inclusive, and the estimated expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

OIL LANDS IN COLOMBIA.

Mr. PHELAN. I submit a resolution and ask that it may lie over under the rule.

The resolution (S. Res. 156) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and is hereby, requested to inform the Senate concerning the recent action of the United States of Colombia affecting American rights in the leasing and ownership of oil lands.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over under the rule.

TREATY WITH COLOMBIA.

Mr. LODGE subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask that the treaty with Colombia, which was reported to the Senate as in open executive session a few days ago, be recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Information has reached the committee from the State Department in regard to a recent decree by Colombia very similar to the Mexican decree, which would amount, probably, if enforced, to a confiscation of private property in oil, and the committee feel that the matter should be examined with care before taking up the treaty.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. PHELAN. I have no objection to that action, but I submitted a resolution this morning calling for information relative to the matter to which the Senator from Massachusetts has referred, and I therefore ask that the resolution I submitted be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. LODGE. I think the information which the Senator from California desires is already before the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the resolution submitted by the Senator from California will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

RESTRICTION OF EXPORTS.

Mr. MYERS. I offer a resolution which I ask may be read and lie on the table for the day.

The resolution (S. Res. 157) was read, as follows:

Whereas the high cost of living, constantly increasing, with no prospect of a cessation or reduction, is a serious and constantly growing menace to the peace and welfare of the people of the United States and to the stability of the Government of the United States; and

Whereas it is expedient and necessary for the Congress to find and provide a remedy for this serious state of affairs: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and it is, instructed and directed to consider forthwith and to report upon the advisability of legislation to restrict or prohibit for a time exports from the United States of food, clothing, hats, caps, leather goods, and other necessities of life; and if it may deem any such legislation advisable, to report to the Senate a proposed form of a bill therefor and to make such suggestions in the premises as it may deem fit and to advise the Senate generally in the premises.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over under the rule.

ST. MARYS, GA., AND GULF OF MEXICO.

Mr. HARRIS. I send to the desk a resolution and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The resolution (S. Res. 158) was referred to the Committee on Commerce, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce, together with the chief of the Division of Inland Waterways of the Railroad Administration, is hereby directed to furnish for the use of the Senate such information as is available from public and private sources, without expense, concerning the advantage and value to the commerce of the country of the acquisition, construction, and maintenance of canals connecting the Atlantic Ocean, at the port of St. Marys, Ga., with the Gulf of Mexico, through the States of Georgia and Florida; such report to include so far as available estimated costs of development of same, respectively, as 30-foot deep canals, what relief will be thereby afforded to lines of existing rail transportation, the extent to which such canals would probably be utilized by the commerce of the country, the incidental value thereof as assisting the national defense, and any other economic advantages and uses such canals would serve.

HIGH COST OF LIVING.

Mr. OWEN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 159), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate be, and he is hereby, directed to appoint from the membership of this Senate a select committee of five Members, for the Sixty-sixth Congress, and which said committee is hereby authorized to fully investigate the high cost of living; and, in addition to the powers herein conferred, shall have the same powers and authority as are now conferred by the rules of the Senate upon the standing committees of the Senate. Said committee is hereby authorized to employ counsel, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths and affirmations, to take testimony, to employ stenographers at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee or its subcommittees, to sit during the sessions of the Senate and during any recess which may occur during its sessions, and may meet at such places as said committee deems advisable. Said committee is also hereby authorized and empowered to appoint such subcommittees as it may deem advisable, and such subcommittees, when so appointed, are hereby authorized to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths and take testimony, and to meet at such times and places as said committee shall from time to time direct; further

Resolved, That said select committee shall report to the Senate in one or more reports, as it may deem advisable, the result of its investigations, with such recommendations as it may care to make; further,

Resolved, That the President of the Senate is hereby authorized to issue subpœnas to witnesses, upon the request of said committee or any subcommittee thereof, during any recess of Congress during the sessions; further,

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate be directed to serve all subpœnas and other process, put into his hands by said committee, or any subcommittee thereof.

INVASION OF UKRAINIAN EAST GALICIA.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I present a memorial, addressed to His Excellency the President of the United States and to the Senators of the United States and Representatives in Congress, from the Ukrainian National Committee of the United States, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Memorial.

To His Excellency the President of the United States and to the Senators of the United States and Representatives in Congress:

The Ukrainian National Committee of the United States hereby enters its solemn protest against the invasion of Ukrainian East Galicia by Polish troops, and at the same time directs your attention to the outrages which, according to well-authenticated reports from the Ukrainian Press Bureau in Paris, France, have been recently committed in East Galicia by the Polish Army under the command of Gen. Haller, which army is composed in part of American citizens of Polish descent, and which, under the pretext of restoring order in East Galicia, has perpetrated many crimes and atrocities against the Ukrainian civil inhabitants and noncombatant population, as witness a few specific instances herein enumerated:

1. In the Ukrainian city of Stryj, occupied by the Polish forces, all the Ukrainian priests and many prominent Ukrainian patriots were arrested and thrown into prison; among others, Rev. Ostap Nizhankovsky, a former deputy to the Galician Diet, Rev. Andrew Pelensky, Rev. Father Lopatinsky, Rev. Father Pelleh, all of whom were shot down by Polish troops without trial of any kind in the early part of June, 1919.

In the Ukrainian village of Bortne, in East Galicia, a priest named Kaluzhniatsky was shot while at the altar engaged in the celebration of the mass and the sacred vestments were torn from his body, the church was desecrated, and many people were driven out through terror. The Polish officer had ordered them to disperse. Those who disobeyed the military order by remaining were shot while in the church by the Polish soldiers. Five hundred Ukrainian churches were closed by the Polish military authorities and about 100 burned. Two hundred priests have been expelled from East Galicia and sent as prisoners to Poland.

2. An aged and venerable resident of the city of Sokal, in East Galicia, named Demchuk, 72 years old, was executed without trial.

3. The Basilian Monastery in Zhovkva (Zolkiev) was sacked and its valuable library and collection of rare and precious treasures were stolen and carried away. All the Basilian monks were arrested and interned.

4. In Domazhir the Ukrainian Catholic Church was desecrated by the Polish soldiers.

5. In Lemberg the Ukrainians were forbidden to hold religious services according to the Ruthenian Catholic ritual. Even funeral services according to the Ruthenian (Ukrainian) ritual were prohibited and all Ukrainians were ordered not to participate in any such funeral ceremonies.

6. In Stanislav, after the occupation by the Polish troops on June 1, 1919, the wounded and sick Ukrainian soldiers were removed from the civil hospital to the military hospital and many of them were there killed in cold blood. The use of the Ukrainian language was proscribed in the hospital.

7. Defenseless peasants of both sexes in the district of Stanislav were shot and wounded for no other reason than because they appeared in public without wearing Polish badges, as required by the Polish military rule for the district. At the railroad station in Stanislav two railroad engineers were executed for no other reason than that they had been in the employ of the Ukrainian Government. Many of the Ukrainian inteligenzia who remained in Stanislav after the Polish occupation were arrested and interned and the more prominent of them were shot to death on the spot. The Jews in Stanislav shared the same fate as the Ukrainians. On the first day of the Feast of Pentecost 300 Ukrainian Jews were dragged out of their beds and flogged; some of them died from their injuries. On the second day of Pentecost the sidelocks of the Jews of the Orthodox rite, which are worn out of religious motives, were forcibly shorn from the Ukrainian Jews in the Stanislav district, so that they might be enumerated as Poles. The leader of the band which committed these outrages against the Ukrainians, both Christians and Jews, was one Polish colonel, Wolgner.

8. The Polish officials in East Galicia, while taking the census of the population, are making a futile effort to divide the Ukrainian people into 10 different and distinct nationalities by applying to them local names; for instance, the Ukrainians who live at the foot of the Carpathian Mountains are called locally Boyki; those who live on the mountains, not far from Bukovina, are called Hutzuli; those on the plains, adjoining the Ukrainian Province of Podolia, are called Podolaki, and so on. Thus the Poles propose to show a preponderance of Polish population over the Ukrainians in the census enumeration. The Ukrainian Jews are compelled by the military authorities to declare themselves Poles, and those who persist in claiming Jewish nationality or Ukrainian nationality are severely punished by the Polish soldiery.

It is respectfully submitted that in order to verify the truth of these reports of outrages and crimes committed against the Ukrainian population by the Polish military authorities an investigation should be ordered either by the President of the United States of America or by Congress or by the peace commission now sitting at Versailles, and that the Senate of the United States withhold the ratification of any treaty with the new Polish State so long as East Galicia is under Polish occupation, and that no treaty whatever be made or ratified with Poland which shall include East Galicia.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD an article I hold in my hand, entitled "What every American should know about the league of nations." It is an analysis of the league by William George Jordan.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

WHAT EVERY AMERICAN SHOULD KNOW ABOUT THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS—FORTY-ONE POINTS OF VAGUENESS, DANGER, AMBIGUITY, IMPRACTICABILITY, AND WEAKNESS OF THE COVENANT OF THE LEAGUE.

[By William George Jordan.]

"There are four things that every American should realize about the covenant of the league of nations:

"1. That all America and all the world, those favoring this covenant and those opposed to it, long for world peace—permanent, safe peace—with equal intensity and sincerity. They differ only as to the means, the method, the way, but are united as to the goal to be reached.

"2. That it is the present plan of a league of nations that is before the American people, not the abstract idea of some kind of a league of nations. Confusion as to this dulls judgment and obscures the issue now before us.

"3. That the motives for good that inspired the writing of this covenant do not in themselves guarantee that the resultant covenant is good, safe, or practical. It must be judged in itself by itself; not by what it sought to do, but by the wisdom of its methods.

"4. The following study and detailed analysis of the covenant reveals some of its evils and dangers and shows that the proposed league would not prevent war but would stimulate it; that in the name of world peace it sets up an insidious oligarchy not representing the peoples of the world and antagonistic to lasting peace and world democracy.

"1. THE TERMS OF ADMITTING NEW MEMBERS ARE NOT DEMOCRATIC.

"In the preamble of this covenant are set forth high ideals and worthy aims and purposes for the peace and harmony of the world. One should expect it would be the first effort to make this a league of all nations; that every fully self-governed State, dominion, or colony applying for admission, subscribing to its requirements, and proving its good faith would be welcomed with open arms. If a nation were weak and struggling, it needs the inspiration and protection of the league; if a nation that is large and dangerous to the peace of the world be willing to enter the league on the league's own terms, the world would surely be safer with that nation within the fold, where it could be watched and controlled, than on the outside.

"But the league does not proceed in admitting new members in a broad spirit of democracy. The league is to be a select, elite society of nations; candidates may not apply for admission; they must be invited to join, as the annex to the covenant shows. Why should it require a two-thirds vote of the assembly to admit a fully-governed State, giving 'effective guaranties of its sincere intention—whatever these words may mean—to observe its international obligations' and 'accepting such regulations as may be prescribed by the league in regard to its military and naval forces and armaments,' provided that it fulfills these prerequisites for admission a two-thirds vote is required to pass the candidate; one-third could blackball. Is this wise? Is it in the spirit of the preamble? Does it make for peace? Is it democratic?

"2. THE MENACE OF THE LEAGUE AS A SUPERGOVERNMENT.

"The serious menace of this league of nations is self-evident when we vividly comprehend the appalling power created behind an alluring name that has dulled public realization of what it really means. This is told with clearness, keen insight, and forceful directness by Hon. David Jayne Hill in these words: 'The league, even in its revised form, as a distinct corporate entity, exercising a will not identical with that of all the separate members, is organized with power to coerce other States not belonging to it, to act under its own rules and by its own judgment, and even to dictate the form of government and degree of authority to be exercised over wide areas and great populations subject to its control.

"'The league of nations as here planned is not a federation in which the component States are combined into a new political organization. It is an autonomous corporation, endowed with its own organs of action. Its being and its powers, when once constituted, would persist if a great part of the constituents should perish. The league is not merely a corporate entity, but, in effect, a supergovernment.'

"3. THE UNITED STATES, ONCE ENTERING THE LEAGUE, COULD NEVER WITHDRAW.

"People in America believe, in general, that the United States could withdraw at any time after two years' notice. Their hurried reading has given them a confidence that is unwarranted and lulled them into a false sense of security and safety. We must face the fact that the United States could not withdraw in two years, and further that it could never voluntarily withdraw under the covenant. There was never any intent to permit withdrawal, of the five powers at least, and article 1 is cunningly written to render withdrawal impossible.

"Article 1 says: 'Any member of the league may after a two years' notice of its intention so to do withdraw from the league, provided that all its international obligations and all its obligations under the covenant shall have been fulfilled at the time of its withdrawal.' The phrases following 'provided' can have but one of two meanings or constructions, either one of which makes withdrawal impossible.

"1. As all 'the obligations under this covenant' are international, the phrase means all international obligations not under this covenant and those that are under the covenant. These two classes of obligations must both 'have been fulfilled at the time of withdrawal.' As never for a moment has the United States since it really started as a Nation fulfilled all its national obligations, and as there never would be a moment when as a 'going concern' it could have all fulfilled, there would never be a time when it could meet the conditions permitting it to withdraw from the league.

"2. The only other possible interpretation of the phrase is that it means 'all its international and other obligations under the covenant.' If the Senate ratified the peace treaty containing the covenant, the United States would be obligated at the start in a dozen or more ways—in every place where the league was interwoven with the treaty. To fulfill these initial obligations alone would take perhaps 25 years; in the meantime new obligations (perhaps among them a mandatory) would be assumed; while these remained unfulfilled still further new ones would be entered into. As there never would be a time of simultaneous maturity or fulfillment, we could never get out.

"Who is to be the judge of when the United States shall have fulfilled its obligations—the United States or the council? The answer is self-evident. It was intended that membership in the league should be perpetual, and the seeming possibility of withdrawal is a subterfuge and a snare.

"4. WOULD THE UNITED STATES BE REPRESENTED BOTH IN THE ASSEMBLY AND THE COUNCIL?

"Read this covenant through from beginning to end, and yet you can not answer with certainty this question. It is puzzling as to whether representation on the council may include or excludes membership in the assembly. Article 3, paragraph 1, says: 'The assembly shall consist of representatives of the members of the league.' This certainly would give members of the council representatives on both bodies. Article 4 specifies five perpetual members and four changing members represented on the council, yet nothing is stated as to their being also represented on the assembly.

"If the nine members of the council are also represented on the assembly, they have dual representation. If this be true, in the few instances where the assembly is permitted to approve an action of the council, nine representatives in the assembly—more than one-third of the present number—would practically be 'stacked' to approve loyally what their fellow representatives on the council had unanimously decided. Is this fair or just? It may be said that this occurs in our own Congress. This is not true, for in our Congress is a difference in the character of the representation—the Senators representing the States and House representing the people. No such difference exists, or is so stated, in the representatives of the membership of the league.

"But while article 3, taken in connection with article 4, would give the members of the council representation on both bodies, and we have prepared ourselves to accept this meaning, we strike a new snag in article 26. This article says: 'Amendments to this covenant shall take effect when ratified by the members of the league whose representatives compose the council and a majority of the members whose representatives compose the assembly.' This seems to imply that the representation on the two bodies is entirely distinct and that representation on either is exclusive of representation on the other. Then article 1 is wrong or article 26 has made a mistake. Which is it?

"5. DO REPRESENTATIVES REPRESENT THEIR GOVERNMENTS OR THEIR PEOPLES?

"This covenant says nothing as to whether representatives of the members of the council and of the assembly represent their respective Governments or their peoples. This should not be left to individual interpretation which would make it a mixed representation, a confusion of interests, where membership might represent people or governments, without any way to determine which was which. Is this a diplomatic or a popular representation?

"The American people have a right to know, so that they may size up the covenant advisedly. Upon the determination of this point rests the determination of the method of choosing the representative and of the power that could recall him should he prove obnoxious or inefficient. Shall he be appointed by the Executive, the Senate, or the Congress? The American people, should this covenant be ratified by the Senate, might deem this office so important that they would demand that he be elected by the people, although this might require an amendment of Article II, section 2, paragraph 2, of the Constitution of the United States.

"6. THE NINE MEN IN GENEVA MOST DANGEROUS BODY WORLD HAS EVER KNOWN.

"The council of the league of nations is the most dangerous, autocratic, oligarchic body of men the world has ever known. It is a supergovernment of nine men, constituting a holding corporation of the international relations of nearly the whole world. Their jurisdiction is unlimited; they are unrestrained and uncurbed by a lower power, for the assembly is but a cipher; they are subject to no higher power, for there is no supreme court of the world that can limit them by interpretation of the covenant nor determine the rightness or wrongness of their acts.

"Behind closed doors, these nine men in Geneva can hold their secret sessions, and with the finality of omniscience issue their edicts, in the form of international obligations, that must be obeyed. Nonfulfillment of these obligations is punishable by expulsion. They can do things that no Government in the world would dare to do without causing war. They propose to bully and coerce small nations, nonmembers of the league, should they go to war, with arrogant contempt for the sovereignty that inheres in every nation and which every other nation is bound to respect.

"These nine men in Geneva, as a supergovernment, can issue their commands to 30 or more nations with the same finality that a free government controls its people on lines like these: 'On and after blank date you will cut off all diplomatic relations with A.' 'Until so notified you shall have no further trade with B.' 'All food supplies to J are hereby stopped until further notice.' 'Q is now declared quarantined.' 'Add Y to your blacklist.' 'On blank date a new general world war is to be started in Africa because the territorial integrity of G has been attacked by H; inclosed please find list of the number of men, tonnage, and character of war vessels and amount of cannon and ammunition you are to furnish.'

"There is nothing exaggerated or unfair to the council in this statement; it is merely putting in direct, plain English what the covenant puts more guardedly. The world is now crushed and bleeding from its struggle with one autocracy in the name of militarism. Are we now anxious to start a new autocracy in the sacred name of peace?

"7. THE COVENANT NOWHERE STATES RELATION OF COUNCIL AND ASSEMBLY TO EACH OTHER.

"The covenant does not define the relation of the council and the assembly to each other. Is the assembly to discuss, to initiate, and to refer matters to the council? Is it to decide any question or line of question for itself? Are the two bodies independent, or do they work in cooperation wherein each is a check on the other? Is the 'decision of the league' what the council decides or what the assembly decides or what they decide together? These questions the covenant does not answer. The framers of the covenant were prudent in not answering them. Had they done so they would have revealed—what is now concealed—that, aside from a few trivial matters, the assembly is an anemic, harmless organization which may hold its meetings and talk as much as it likes, but no way is provided for it to convert its talk into action.

"8. THE ASSEMBLY A HARMLESS BODY THAT CAN TALK BUT CAN NOT ACT.

"It is only by going carefully over the entire 26 articles and checking off every reference to the assembly that we begin to realize how little the assembly amounts to in the affairs of the league. The scope of activity of the council and of the assembly is expressed in identical words. Each 'may deal at all its meetings with any matter within the sphere of action of the league or affecting the peace of the world,' but nothing is said as to any difference in the method of dealing with the questions. The council can act; no way is provided for the assembly to act.

"Here is the complete list of what the assembly can do under the covenant so far as stated. The assembly acts as a membership committee, admitting new members. It arranges the details of procedure of its own meetings. It elects four members of the council (but it is not stated that these four in any way represent the assembly on the council). It approves or disapproves of the council's action on these three questions: (1) An increase of the members of the council, (2) an addition to the perpetual members of the council, (3) the appointment of a secretary-general. The assembly has also a part, with the council, in somehow making amendments to the covenant.

"Aside from those referring to these minor duties there are only three other references (articles 11, 15, and 19) to the activities of the assembly. Under article 15 it may, under certain conditions, attempt to arbitrate a dispute likely to lead to a rupture between members. Its report or award must be by majority vote of the assembly, ratified by the unanimous vote of the council, exclusive, with both bodies, of any representatives of any of the members party to the dispute. When the council handles such a case its action is final, the assembly has no voice. When the assembly acts, its decision requires unanimous approval of the council.

"Under article 11, the assembly, as well as the council, may have brought to its attention any circumstance whatever affecting international relations which threatens peace or good understanding. Whether the assembly may act, what it may do, or how is not stated. Perhaps it may be permitted to report them to the council.

"Under article 14, it may advise the reconsideration of treaties which have become inapplicable and the consideration of international conditions endangering peace.

"No one of these represents any real power. In the appalling power of the council and its momentous decisions, the assembly has no more voice than if it did not exist. It has semblance without reality. The assembly seems to have been organized as an empty, barren honor created to recognize the smaller nations, to let them talk, and to keep them occupied harmlessly while the nine men do the real work.

"9. THREE FUNCTIONS ALL EXERCISED BY THE SAME NINE MEN IN GENEVA.

"In this supergovernment vested in the hands of nine men in Geneva, under the covenant, they exercise three functions of government: The executive, the legislative, and the judicial. The three powers, kept specifically separate by our own Government under the Constitution, are here all exercised by the same nine men in Geneva as a finality from which there is no appeal.

"10. FUTILITY OF EXPECTING NINE REPRESENTATIVES IN THE COUNCIL TO VOTE UNANIMOUSLY.

"The vote of the council or of the assembly, except where otherwise expressly provided in the covenant, and these are only matters of procedure or of trivial import, 'shall require the agreement of all the members of the league represented at the meeting.' The action is to be unanimous. Can you get a board of directors, composed of nine members, to vote unanimously on any big vital question even where their interests are common and perhaps identical? Can you imagine the nine men in Geneva, representing five great powers and four smaller ones, with diverse policies, clashing interests, and different ideals, agreeing unanimously on any big vital question? Such a thing might be possible in heaven, but not on earth. Yet the whole structure of this league of nations rests on the unanimous action of nine men—the assembly is but a collection of figureheads that can do nothing.

"This unanimous voting of the nine men in Geneva would deadlock action, because only one man becomes a majority in his power to oppose and to kill action. But the council must act, and therefore it would act. The unanimity that could not be secured naturally would be secured artificially. Behind closed doors the council would barter, juggle, compromise, trade votes, play one interest against the other, and use every means known to 'practical politics' to secure a unanimity that would be well paid for.

"There are those in America who regard this unanimity as making the league of nations safe for the United States. There is no safe place for the United States within the league; the only safe place is outside. It is claimed that our representative could kill any action adverse to our interests. This is absurd from a dozen points of view; but the statement of one may suffice. If there were a dispute before the council between the United States and another member, both represented on the council, neither would vote, and the case would be tried by seven men not nine. Article 15 says the members can not go to war if all the members of the council 'other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute' vote against it.

"There is one thing that the assembly is permitted to do: It is to advise the reconsideration, by members of the league, of old back-number treaties. To take even this harmless action would require the unanimous vote of the assembly, as nothing to the contrary is 'expressly provided.' Have you a picture in your mind's eye of the 33 members (more or less, as you may interpret the covenant) agreeing unanimously even on this in the case of a specific treaty? Just at the critical moment might not the representative from Hejaz or from Czechoslovakia arise and say 'I object,' and the whole action would be quashed?

"11. NO MENTION OF A QUORUM FOR EITHER COUNCIL OR ASSEMBLY.

"This covenant constitution strangely omits an important item in not stating what shall be a quorum in the council and in the assembly, and providing the method by which this quorum might be changed should an increase in the representation in either body make such change desirable. Without a quorum restriction three or four of the nine men in Geneva might decide, on some important question, the fate of the world for all time.

"12. THE APPALLING POWER OF ONE MAN ACTING FOR A HUNDRED MILLION.

"Our representative in the council of the league of nations would have an appalling power, unapproached by any representative or ambassador the United States has ever had or by any officer of the Government. The powers of all these are limited, held in check by constitutional or congressional safeguards. This office is in a class by itself. An ambassador may negotiate treaties and agreements, but he is ever in touch with the State Department, advising him, directing him, authorizing him. No such wise restriction could hedge in and limit the power of this representatve. We are not even informed whether he would represent the people or the Government. Would he be responsible to the Congress or would it be to the executive branch of our Government?

"In theory clear explicit limitations could be placed on what he could do and what he could not do; in practice this would be impossible. Whatever of our sovereignty we have to part with to enter this league is abrogated not to the league but to the council made up of nine men in Geneva, and our representative, as one of the nine, shares in that power. If our representative had specific limitations, he would not be on equality with the other members of the council who might have no such limitations or have different limitations. If on any subject these restrictions debarred him from voting at all, the unanimous vote of the other eight or a lesser number that might be present would bind us just as securely as though our representative had voted with the others.

"If the council were about to decide some important world question on which our representative were in doubt, he could not delay the decision and hold up the council for a week or a month to get 'advice' or 'instructions' from 'home.' All the questions, or most of them, would belong to this class of big international problems which we have sent our representative to decide, and if we enter this league we would have to give our representative power to act.

"A supergovernment demands supermen to run it and they must have superpowers. This council of the league is a supergovernment, disguise it as they may. The menace of it all is seen throughout the covenant whenever, escaping for a moment from the glamor and spell of its impractical visionary plans for a new world to be ever at peace, we get down to 'brass tacks' in a practical way and interpret its smooth-sounding phrases in terms of the practical.

"The representative of the United States would represent a population of over a hundred millions. He would have to speak for us and to decide for us on supremely important questions never before put into the power of any one man to decide, questions involving not only our international relations as they exist normally to-day, but as they will be artificially and dangerously interwoven with the affairs of other nations and complicated and interrelated beyond extrication.

"Suppose that the American people realized with vividness and crystal clearness the colossal importance of the questions the nine men of Geneva are to decide with a finality, absolute and unimpeachable. What American would they choose for their representative? What one American, what superman to be one of nine in a supergovernment, measures up to the infinite requirements of the position of final, absolute representative of a hundred million people, to be intrusted with supreme power hitherto held sacred by the American people and intrusted, under the Constitution, only to its executive, its legislative, and its judicial departments?

"13. FUTILITY OF THE LEAGUE'S PROPOSED METHOD OF REDUCING ARMAMENTS.

"All of article 8, on the reduction of national armaments, is weak, shifty, evasive. There is no vital gripping of a big subject in a big determined way. It is treated with the hesitance and trembling of a timid woman lifting up a loaded revolver. The council 'shall formulate plans for such reduction for the consideration and action of the several Governments.' The assembly, with its 24 members represented by 72 representatives, is not consulted at all in this momentous work; the nine men in Geneva are all sufficient.

"It might be inferred that the 'plans' were general statements of method to be discussed, but they are not; they 'fix the limits of armament.' This means that they specify what number of soldiers, what tonnage of navy and details of implements of war, each member of the league is to have. These nine men in Geneva, behind closed doors, all by themselves, are to make their assignments individually for each of 35 nations. The figures set seem final and not subject to modification by the Governments, for what follows is unmistakably clear: 'After these plans shall have been adopted by the several Governments limits of armaments therein fixed shall not be exceeded without the concurrence of the council.' Each Government is supposed to be very good, and to do precisely what the nine men in Geneva tell them to do, and to rubber stamp its acceptance.

"It is not stated anywhere in the article whether the Governments agree to abide by 'the formulated plans' of the council. At first flush it seems that the 'plans' are merely suggestive and tentative and that the action of the council is only advisory, but this can not be so or the whole thing would be but a poor pretentious farce. While the council here extends the soft glove of diplomatic gentleness it shows the powerful hand of steel in article 1, paragraph 2, where it enumerates what an invited State must agree to in securing entrance into the league, and says, 'and shall accept such regulations as may be prescribed by the league in regard to its military and naval force and armaments.' There is no mistake here. The reduction of armaments is not optional. It is a regulation, an order, a command.

"Of course, no nation will reduce its armaments until all agree to do so, and yet this covenant says nothing as to the time for so doing or as to what shall determine the time. The nine men in Geneva say: 'It shall be done; and it is done.' 'Let there be light; and there was light.' The nations of the world may reduce armaments; it may come from better understandings between them, the force of public sentiment in some nations starting a general movement, or from a joint action of representatives of all or many nations conferring with dignity and agreeing on a basis of reduction. But it can not come from the ipse dixit of this supergovernment of nine men, around a table in Geneva.

"Can you imagine the United States Government accepting the order of these nine men in Geneva cutting down the Army, Navy, and cannon, as 'per schedule inclosed herewith,' and agreeing, as she must under the covenant, not to add one soldier, one vessel, or one cannon unless she gets her requisition signed and countersigned by the nine men in Geneva? Can you imagine the nine representatives 'formulating their plan' ever agreeing unanimously, for themselves and with each other, on the 'limit of armaments therein fixed' for each of them? Can you imagine the nine Governments agreeing? If you can imagine this you can easily imagine that all the absurdities in this covenant are good.

"Nothing is specified as to whether the 'fixed limit' is what a nation may have or must have. A small nation living at peace with her neighbors and having a small army would naturally have to increase this if she is to be ready to go to war at any time at the call of the nine men in Geneva. This proposed reduction must in reality be no reduction, but an increase. Our administration at Washington is planning for a larger standing Army than we have ever had on a peace footing, and a larger Navy—all this in the face of the demand that the Senate ratify this covenant.

"14. PRESERVING TERRITORIAL INTEGRITY AND POLITICAL INDEPENDENCE OF 40 NATIONS.

"The article in this covenant that has roused most violent opposition is article 10, which reads as follows: 'The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve, as against external aggression, the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league. In case of any such aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.'

"The hypocrisy manifest in this article is shown at once in the fact that the powers that framed and accepted this agreement to respect and preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of the members of the league in the peace treaty shamelessly turned over to Japan part of Shantung, a rich Province of China. Suppose that within a year or so China, a sleeping giant of pacifism, were to awake and, tossing off her obligations to the league as though they were light coverlets, were to declare war against Japan to recover the Province unjustly taken from her. The United States would have to go to war against China and to aid Japan.

"Suppose that Russia under her mad spell of Bolshevikism were to attack some minor State, a member of the league. What a mad war with its appalling cost in money and lives might the United States have to fight. When the peace treaty shall have been consummated, middle Europe will be divided into 15 sovereignties. We are to be responsible for all these and be ready to face the future war that must come from the seeds of hate and injustice implanted in the peace treaty.

"We are to bind ourselves to respect and preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of 40 or 50 States for all time, not only when they are invaded, but to do whatever the nine men in Geneva declare we shall do in case of even any threat or danger of aggression. We are to send our brave sons to be maimed or to lie wounded and dead in desert wastes, lone mountain passes, or tropical jungles, because the boundary lines of some country, for whose area we do not, honestly, in our hearts, care a fig, has been threatened. It is impossible to conceive that this is presented to us seriously. Do they imagine that America is a nation made up of either fools or fanatics? This is altruism gone crazy, internationalism running amuck.

"Under this article, State boundaries become petrified and unchangeable. Had this league been in operation in 1898 we could never have taken Cuba from the inhuman rule of Spain and given her a new start in life and might even have had to fight with Spain against Cuba. The United States should be free to elect which side it should fight on were war necessary, not to be compelled to battle on the side that may mean cruel wrong and injustice.

"So dangerous is all that is covered in this article that even if the whole article were stricken out the menace would be merely lessened not altogether removed, for what would be banished as a direct specific agreement would largely remain by inference and in essence. We would be called into war by the general terms of the covenant to do all that we attempt to repudiate doing in our cutting out of this article.

"15. CONFLICTING STATEMENTS AS TO RESORTING TO WAR BETWEEN THE NATIONS.

"Article 12 says the parties to a dispute 'agree in no case to resort to war until three months after the award by the arbitrators or the report of the council.' Articles 13 and 15 pledge the disputant not to go to war with any party to the dispute complying with the award or the report. If the parties are not to go to war, why the three months' limitation? Or does it mean that if the parties do not comply with the award or the report that then they are perfectly free to go to war?

"16. WHERE NATIONS ABROGATE ALL RIGHT TO SETTLE THEIR OWN DISPUTES.

"Article 12 says: 'The members of the league agree that if there should arise between them any dispute likely to lead to a rupture they will submit the matter to arbitration or to inquiry by the council.' This means that every dispute likely to lead to a rupture must be submitted to one of two bodies—an arbitration court or the council. The words are explicit, all-inclusive, final; there are no exceptions. No words or phrases are inserted such as 'should the parties to the dispute be unable to reach a settlement between themselves' or 'should diplomatic negotiations fail to bring about a settlement.' The league assumes a monopoly in the settling of 'any dispute likely to lead to a rupture'; it prescribes a dilemma of recourse—either arbitration or the council. There is no other alternative, and the members agree to this.

"Under this article 12 should a 'dispute likely to lead to a rupture' occur between the United States and Great Britain, the two nations could not get together to attempt to reach a settlement, or appeal to the kindly offices of a friendly power. The nine men in Geneva, jealous of their prerogatives, could say to the two disputants: 'You have no longer a right to attempt to settle this matter between yourselves, you have abrogated your right under article 12 of the covenant.' This may possibly have not been the intent of the article; this we can not say with finality. But in ratifying the covenant the United States binds itself to what every interpretation this council can put on the words of the covenant, not what we think was intended.

"17. MENACE OF INTERNATIONAL MEDDLING STIMULATED BY THE COVENANT.

"If any individual meddles in the personal, business, or family affairs of another, assuming superior wisdom, offering unasked-for, unwelcome, and obnoxious advice and suggestion, it is resented as unwarranted and impertinent intrusion. Such a course of interference in what is not one's concern is likely to lead to strained relations and broken friendships; it does not make for peace.

"What is true as a principle with individuals is equally true as a principle with nations, for they are but individuals en masse, writ large as a collection of people united under a common government. The meddling which we all deplore in our personal lives this league by its covenant actually stimulates, inspires, and incites in the second paragraph of article 11 as follows: 'It is also declared to be the friendly right of each member of the league to bring to the attention of the assembly or of the council any circumstance whatever affecting international relations which threatens to disturb either the peace or the good understanding between nations upon which peace depends.'

"If the words 'friendly right' mean anything in their relation to the context they mean that it is the 'duty' of each member. The words 'any circumstance whatever' could not be more general and all-conclusive. It is not even the representatives of the members but the members, the States, colonies, and dominions themselves, that are thus urged to benevolent but impertinent interference. Suppose that Great Britain, constrained by a high sense of duty, were to call the attention of the council to the fact that it was with a sense of deep regret that Great Britain had observed the now roused and growing opposition permeating Japan regarding the exclusion act of the United States, and that unless something were done to alleviate the situation that the peace of the world might be disturbed, and further might it not be, after all, that the matter was not one solely of domestic jurisdiction as America claimed?

"Would this exercise by Great Britain of her 'friendly right,' as stated in the covenant, materially strengthen the cordial relations between the two great powers? Would the American press accept in a gracious, subdued spirit the suggestion from Great Britain? Would our Government send a letter of thanks to its friend across the sea?

"Suppose that the United States, with motives as pure and exalted as those of Great Britain, were to express her fear, in a talk with the council or the assembly, that the growing influence and control of China by Japan might threaten the 'political independence or the territorial integrity' of the great Mongol Empire and thus precipitate a world war.

"Would not China, if she has any spunk, inform the United States that China considers herself amply able to manage her own affairs and diplomatically request the United States to concentrate her energies on her own activities? Might not Japan gently and regretfully rebuke America and inform her whither she might go?

"18. WEAKNESS OF THE LEAGUE'S FIRST METHOD OF PREVENTING WAR.

"Arbitration, as a general method, can prevent war only when submission to it is compulsory and when fulfillment of its awards is compulsory. The arbitration in the covenant fails in these two essentials. If nations would voluntarily submit disputes to arbitration, fulfill the award, and then would not go to war, there would be practically little need for this league of nations. This could all be accomplished to-day without any league. They could appeal to The Hague court, which is really a panel from which judges may be selected, or the disputants could agree to any other court that might be formed. If nations were very good, they would, of course, arbitrate voluntarily; but the league has been formed because nations are not good and the league is to make them good; and yet the covenant on this particular point has no power to make them good. Let us study both of the two points.

"(1) Submission to arbitration is purely voluntary. Article 13 says: 'The members of the league agree that whenever any dispute shall arise between them which they recognize to be suitable to arbitration and which can not satisfactorily be settled by diplomacy, they will submit the whole matter to arbitration.' If either or both of two parties to a dispute do not want to submit to arbitration, all that is necessary to evade it is to plead an inability to 'recognize that the dispute is suitable for arbitration.' If either party fails to 'recognize,' they need not arbitrate.

"(2) Suppose they do arbitrate, and the loser, despite his agreement 'to carry out in full good faith any award that may be rendered and that he will not resort to war against a member of the league which complies therewith,' does not fulfill the award and does go to war, what can the league do to prevent it? The loser may find good excuses satisfactory to itself for dodging the agreement, just as human beings sometimes do—'the decision was manifestly unfair and unjust,' etc. If one or both of the nations decide to go to war, neither arbitration nor the league can prevent.

"19. WEAKNESS OF THE LEAGUE'S SECOND METHOD OF PREVENTING WAR.

"Disputes not subject to settlement by arbitration are to be submitted to the council, the nine men in Geneva. The inquiry by the council amounts to less even than the resort to arbitration. Even when its settlement is unanimous, it merely advises or recommends. The parties to the dispute are not bound to accept the recommendations, but the parties bind themselves not to go to war with the one that complies. This is simply puerile. If nations were angels, this would work. Of course, the one favored would comply; but, as the other does not accept the advice or recommendations of the council, the dispute remains unsettled; the opposition, the bitterness, sense of injustice, etc., are burning as furiously as ever; the condition 'likely to lead to a rupture' is just what it was before. Nothing is settled, yet one is ordered not to go to war. The nation not complying has no higher appeal. Suppose it were to go to war to end an unbearable condition, the whole world, so far as represented by the league, would be against it. Can we believe such nonsense as this would end war?

"Suppose neither party found the recommendations satisfactory and neither complies; could they then go to war? If so, on which side would the world fight? Would it fight against both, or would the choice of sides be left to the individual option of the nations?

"Suppose the council decided that the question was purely within the domestic jurisdiction of one of the parties it would 'make no recommendation for its settlement.' After the council has thus left the dispute unsettled and has washed its hands of the whole affair, would the parties then be permitted to start a war which could not be a private performance between the two, but one into which the whole world must be dragged?

"If the parties to the dispute really want advice or recommendations as to adjusting it, they can get just as good a brand from the leaders in their own countries and from advice of friendly powers as they can get from the nine men in Geneva, who hold no corner on human wisdom. Surely the methods of the council do not show it can prevent war.

"20. WEAKNESS OF THE LEAGUE'S THIRD METHOD OF PREVENTING WAR.

"Article 12 says that any dispute likely to lead to rupture shall be 'submitted to arbitration or to inquiry by the council.' If there be anything unequivocal in the covenant, it is the finality of these two as the only source of action on disputes. Yet in the drafting of article 15 some one suddenly remembered the existence of the assembly, and it was decided to let it try its hand at 'inquiring,' but it was not deemed necessary to incorporate the afterthought in article 12.

"Under certain conditions the assembly may inquire into a dispute, on lines similar to those of the council. Its findings must be approved by a majority of the members present in the assembly and ratified by the unanimous vote of the council, exclusive, in both bodies, of representatives of the members party to the dispute. The report of the council does not have to be ratified by the assembly, but that of the assembly must be ratified by the council unanimously.

"The report of the assembly is not mandatory, but advisory, like that of the council, and is subject to all the same inherent weakness and ineffectiveness to prevent war just cited in regard to the report of the council.

"21. WEAKNESS OF THE LEAGUE'S FOURTH METHOD OF PREVENTING WAR.

"If it were possible to get nations that were so infuriated and roused as to be ready to spring at each other's throats to wait a whole year, many wars would be prevented. This is not open to question, but the 'if' is a very large one. Would a mere agreement to do so hold a nation that might already have borne past the melting point of patience and control? It may be asked, Why would a nation have to wait a year? It would take some time—perhaps a month—to arrange for the meeting of the court of arbitration or of the council; perhaps a month or so to present and argue the dispute, 6 months for an award, and then 3 months more before starting war—10 months or a year altogether.

"Suppose one nation were suffering cruel wrong at the hands of another; could you possibly imagine the opposing armies, massed on either side of the border line, eagerly regarding their wrist watches to determine the moment when the time limit had expired, so they might conscientiously fulfill their promise to the league? It is like telling an angry man to count 300 before speaking, so that his words may be calm and courteous. If he can be made to do it, it is good—very good. If nations can be made to do it, it is good—very good. But human nature will have to be revised first.

"22. WEAKNESS OF THE LEAGUE'S FIFTH METHOD OF PREVENTING WAR.

"Under article 16 the covenant details the steps the league would take against any nation resorting to war. It is the fear of these that the league counts on as a deterrent to prevent war. Summed up in a sentence, it means that in the future every smallest war is guaranteed to be made a world war. This would be as if a city sought to stop street fighting by declaring that 'hereafter should anyone start a fight in any alley, lane, byway, street, avenue, highway, square, or boulevard, it shall be the duty of all other inhabitants of the city to leave their peaceful occupation or business and join in said fight, in order that street fights shall be made so awful that individuals will be deterred from starting one.' This might eventually stop street fighting, but, oh, what a cost!

"Under article 8 we have an impractical attempt at reduction of armies and navies; yet to fulfill the conditions under article 16 would require that the country of every nation in the league be transformed into an armed camp, with soldiers trained, equipped, and ready to go into war at the drop of a hat by the nine men in Geneva.

"The league unreservedly guarantees that hereafter every war shall be a world war. Listen to the opening words of article 16: 'Should any member of the league resort to war in disregard of its covenants under articles 12, 13, or 15, it shall ipso facto be deemed to commit an act of war against all other members of the league.' The covenant determines and declares that a condition not necessarily affecting or involving the rest of the world shall be made to affect it and involve it.

"The member who resorts to war is to be fought with war of every kind—war diplomatic, war economic, war industrial, war commercial, war financial, war of boycott, war of prohibition, of personal intercourse, war of every kind, culminating in war with armies, navies, and cannon. Lest we forget, it may be noted that 25 or so nations united to use all these wars against Germany for a long part of four years before she was vanquished. Then, too, all these nations were roused to fever heat of hatred and revulsion because of her inhuman tactics, her barbarism, and her unspeakable atrocities; they were united, too, by the fear of what might come to them individually were Germany to triumph. Then, too, there were great armies and great navies, and yet Germany withstood this united opposition for years.

"But in a future war, called by the nine men in Geneva, there may be no such rousing, no such thrill of a common inspiration to kill, no intense glow of a great common sentiment and a common emotion, fusing the nations into one body with but one mind and one purpose. In the future our interest in the dispute may be but casual, impersonal, incidental; and yet, at the general alarm sounded by the nine men in Geneva, we are to jump into our uniforms and battle as valiantly for a theory of ending war as we then fought to kill an enemy common to us all and a menace that cast its dark shadow across every doorway.

"23. MAKING NO DISTINCTION BETWEEN OFFENSIVE AND DEFENSIVE WARFARE.

"There is an eloquent silence in the covenant as to the status of a member whose territory has been invaded by an enemy, either a member of the league or a nonmember. If the member whose territory has been invaded resists and repels the attack, it is technically resorting to war. It is a defensive war, of course, but none the less war. The covenant makes no distinction between defensive and offensive war.

"Suppose the Mexican Army should invade our southern border, burn, pillage, and destroy our cities, and outrage, torture, maim, and kill our people; what should the United States do? Should our Government, through its proper department, write a letter to the secretary general at Geneva and tell him all about it and ask him to try to get the council together? Should we then wait a month or so at a hearing, wait six months for the report, and then three months more before beginning war on the Mexicans? What, think you, would the Mexicans be doing in the meantime—that golden year of immunity in their one-sided war?

"As the covenant chances not to say anything of this subject, could we perhaps risk offending the council by deciding this little matter for ourselves, just in our own way?

"24. THE ENTANGLING OF NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL QUESTIONS.

"Under article 15 the nine men in Geneva may declare, in a dispute with two parties, that the subject is, under international law, solely within the domestic jurisdiction of one of the parties. But international law makes no clear, distinct line of demarcation between domestic and international questions. International law is not codified so that you may turn to a given page as one would turn to the Code of Civil Procedure and find the answer. It is vague, made up from treaties and decisions from many sources, precedents but not finalities, and absolutely without enactment or power to give them enactment. If the council can decide that a certain question is a domestic question, it might, on different authorities, decide it an international question; and in that case the dispute would go to arbitration, should both of the parties agree.

"Japan pleads international law against our discriminatory exclusion of her emigrants from our shores. Japan makes it racial; we might consider it merely economic. We claim it is purely a domestic question. Our tariff policy we also declare as subject to no foreign interference. Dozens of other similar questions would be thrown by us into the chaos of league adjustment, where we might be forced to submit or to go to war if we entered this league. The final tribunal of international disputes is either arbitration or war. The league, with its whole incomplete, inefficient, and ineffective plans, interposes itself and by its very interference would foment discords which it could not allay, and in this as in other phases it would breed war instead of preventing it.

"25. HOW IT IS PROPOSED TO TREAT NONMEMBERS OF THE LEAGUE.

"By what right, under international law, can this league, this supergovernment, override, coerce, and bully States, nonmembers of its body, that have not surrendered any of their sovereignty to it and do not recognize its self-constituted authority? Starting out brazenly with such an appalling assumption of power, what will this league become when it has fattened through the years?

"A State free and self-governed has, under international law, these three attributes: (1) Possession of sovereign power to pledge the community in its relation with similar sovereign communities; (2) independence of all external control; (3) dominion over a determinate territory. Each and all of these three essentials of sovereignty, which inhere as truly and as absolutely in the smallest as in the most powerful State, this league rides over and reduces to nothingness.

"Contrast the statements given below of what this league proposes to do to these nonmembers with the high-sounding, virtuous claims of the preamble of the covenant. There its attempt to achieve international peace and security is to come, among other ways, 'by the prescription of open, just, and honorable relations between nations, by the firm establishment of the understandings of international law as to the actual rule of conduct among governments.' Let us see how these fine professions of theoretic virtue fade away when brought in contact with realities.

"Under article 17 should there be a dispute between a league member and a nonmember, the nonmember is invited to temporary membership to give the league opportunity to fix up matters. The nonmember State may never have been invited to join this elite society of Governments, or it may have been invited and then blackballed as unworthy. Even now, if the temporary membership be accepted, it has a guest card, but it is not considered of the same class as the regular members, and it gets some special treatment—'the provisions of articles 12 to 16, inclusive, shall be applied with such modification as may be deemed necessary by the council.' Should the nonmember State refuse these kindly offices of the nine men in Geneva and go to war, all the varieties of wars catalogued in article 16 are to be let loose on her.

"Should two nonmembers be 'invited,' refuse, and then go to war, the council 'may take such measure, etc.' This means only degrees of article 16. By what right does this league, which excludes from its membership a group of States in Europe comprising more than half the population of Europe, attempt to deprive them, or any of them, of 'independence of all external control'?

"Under article 11 'any war or threat of war, whether immediately affecting any of the members of the league or not, is hereby declared a matter of concern of the whole league.' The league has no more right to declare that these nonmembers shall not go to war than the nonmembers of the league should have to unite and form a counter association and declare that the members of the league shall go to war. Even granting the honest intent and exalted aim of the league does not excuse or condone its methods with those not in accord with it. The schoolboy's definition of the Puritans applies well to the league, when he said, 'They were men that came to this country to worship in their own way and to make other people do the same.'

"Under paragraph 1 of article 16, should any member of the league resort to war, the league immediately subjects it to the severance of all commercial and financial relations and all personal intercourse, and all this applies to the nationals of a nonmember just as to a State member of the league. What becomes of the sovereign power of these neutrals in the face of the militarism of the league? It dares to do this because it has the might, but that does not make right. Members must give passage to troops through their country. How long would it be, with the rights of neutrals already outraged, before the league would force passage for its armies through the State of a neutral as Germany sought to sweep its armies through Belgium?

"26. THE LIMITATIONS OF THE PROPOSED PERMANENT COURT OF INTERNATIONAL JUSTICE.

"Article 14 says: 'The council shall formulate and submit to the members of the league for adoption plans for the establishment of a permanent court of international justice.' The council is to do this; the assembly, as in all cases of real important work, is not considered. The plan is to be submitted to the members of the league; that is, to the nations direct. What body in the United States is to approve or disapprove the adoption? This brings again vividly the point as to whether it is our people or the Government that is represented in the league. This determination would be decisive in placing the power that should properly approve or disapprove of the plans for the court. What is to determine the adoption of the 'plans'—the unanimous vote of the nations, the vote of two-thirds, or the vote of the majority? The covenant does not say.

"This proposed court is to be 'permanent.' Is it to be permanent in the sense of having continuous existence as an institution, or is it to be always in session? It will have two fundamental weaknesses: (1) Recourse to it is not obligatory, for article 13 gives disputants the choice of courts in the words, 'The court shall be the court agreed upon by the parties to the dispute or stipulated in any convention existing between them'; (2) it can not enforce its decisions. It would have the value only of any other international court when voluntary submission of a dispute is followed by voluntary acceptance of its decisions or voluntary rejection.

"27. WHEN THE COUNCIL FAILS TO SETTLE A DISPUTE BETWEEN MEMBERS.

"By the terms of article 15, should the council fail to come to a unanimous agreement in its attempt to settle an international dispute, we have a curious situation. The nine men in Geneva, in whom the world is asked to believe as able to prevent war, having met another failure, have a bright idea. The article states that when the council has found it can do nothing, 'the members of the league reserve to themselves the right to take such action as they shall consider necessary for the maintenance of right and justice.' The members of the league, remember, are the States, colonies, and dominions themselves. The disputants are ruthlessly cast out of the sanctuary of the council room and thrown into the arena, where 33 nations may do with them as they wish.

"The members take 'such action as they shall consider necessary,' individually, for the league is the only method provided for the members to act collectively or in concert. Suppose the disputants felt that the treatment later received at the hands of any or all of the 33 nations is so unjust that it is 'likely to lead to a rupture,' should the aggrieved parties, in loyalty to their agreement with the league, be again required to appear before the nine men in Geneva to have the new disputes settled as was the old one?

"28. VAGUE, HIGH-SOUNDING GENERALITIES TO DISTRACT ATTENTION FROM FAILURE.

"Article 15 says that if the council fails to reach a unanimous report, 'the members of the league reserve to themselves the right to take such action as they shall consider necessary for the maintenance of right and justice.' Who is to determine then, and how can it then, if undetermined, be maintained?

"There are a number of similar clauses, vague, high-sounding generalities in this covenant. Wherever the council fails or is in a tight place there is introduced some such clause to cover its failure. There is in each a suggestion that the council has in reserve a trump card up its sleeve; but we feel the sleeve, and it is empty of cards.

"29. THE LEAGUE'S POWERLESSNESS IN THE MATTER OF INTERNATIONAL TREATIES.

"Article 17 says: 'Every convention or international engagement entered into henceforward by any member of the league shall be registered with the secretariat and shall, as soon as possible, be published by it. No such treaty or international engagement shall be binding until so registered.'

"Assuming for the moment, though not conceding, that this is an unmixed good and would make for peace, why should not all existing treaties be included? With all Europe interwoven by secret treaties, which are still in force and which will so remain, little good will be accomplished. Under article 20 the members agree to get out of all these treaties not consistent with the league. Can you imagine them doing it? Are they to be so good that they will never make another secret treaty? If they did, what could the council do with its foolish and impotent last clause as to the 'binding' quality? If France and England made such a treaty and wanted to keep it, what power could the league, or the nine men in Geneva, have to compel them to break it? If two nations made a treaty and registered it, and one abrogated it, what power would there be to enforce it?

"Under the acid test of direct application the whole power of the league is shown to be a pseudo power dependent on voluntary acceptance and submission; it has no power to compel. The power of the league is like a lead nickel; it is just as good as a real nickel so long as it is accepted, but when it is challenged it is worthless.

"30. THE HOPELESS MUDDLE IN THE MATTER OF AMENDING THE COVENANT.

"The Constitution of the United States gives in explicit words the method of procedure in amending it; there is nothing similar in the covenant constitution of the league. Shall the proposed amendment be initiated by the council or by the assembly, or by either? Shall it be discussed by two bodies separately or in joint session? Shall any member of either body have the right to propose it, and what is the next procedure? Shall the proposed amendment be discussed simultaneously or shall it be referred only to the other body when the initiating body shall have acted? What is the vote necessary to pass it, ready for ratification? No single one of these questions, which are so vital, is answered in the covenant. Could not the representative of any member in either body declare that 'as the covenant does not provide a way to amend it, the covenant should be amended so as to provide a way to amend it'?

"To realize not merely the doubt and confusion but the absolute chaos of article 26 it must be read in full and studied carefully: 'Amendments to this covenant will take effect when ratified by the members of the league whose representatives compose the council and by a majority of the members of the league whose representatives compose the assembly. Such amendment shall not bind any member of the league which signifies its dissent therefrom, but in that case it shall cease to be a member of the league.'

"When read hurriedly, one gets the idea that the amendment must be ratified by a unanimous vote of the council and by a majority vote of the assembly, but this is incorrect. The amendment must be ratified by the members themselves, not their representatives; the members are the States, dominions, or colonies making up the league. As nothing is said as to the manner of initiating the amendment to give it the preliminary passage that must precede submission for ratification, we are at sea in attempting to understand.

"Suppose that somehow the amendment has passed some body or bodies in Geneva (at present unknown) and were submitted to the United States for ratification. As an amendment, it would doubtless follow the same process as required for the original covenant, the joint action of the President and the Senate. Were this ratification not forthcoming the amendment would be killed, for as one essential to its effectiveness it must be ratified unanimously by the members represented on the council. If these nations were unanimous in ratifying and a majority of the other States, colonies, or dominions represented in the assembly also approved, the new amendment would be carried.

"But would the minority of the members represented in the assembly, by their refusal to approve, be construed to have 'signified' dissent therefrom? Or would it have to be 'signified' after the amendment had been finally adopted? In either event why is the point left open for honest doubt as to the meaning? Why is the member 'signifying dissent' not given the privilege of withdrawing, instead of being expelled? Why, too, is no time limit set for ratification?

"31. DANGERS OF THE SYSTEM OF MANDATORIES AS OUTLINED IN THE COVENANT.

"The longest article in this covenant is article 22, relating to mandatories, and is concerned with the orphaned colonies or dependencies whose nation fathers have died politically in our present war. They are in various stages of helplessness, as the covenant shows, and require different kinds of guardianship.

"These communities are of three classes: (1) Parts of Turkey, with recognition of their existence as independent nations, yet 'requiring administrative advice and assistance by a mandatory until such time as they are able to stand alone'; (2) other peoples so undeveloped that the mandatory shall be responsible for the administration of the territory; (3) small-sized territories which are to be administered by the mandatory as integral parts of its own State.

"With the communities of the first class, it is stated that 'the wishes of these communities must be the principal consideration in the selection of the mandatory.' As nothing is said as to the wishes of the other two classes it must be assumed that their wishes for a specified mandatory or for any mandatory at all are to be treated with high-handed disregard. This league—which does not own one acre of the territories it is thus parceling out to guardians nor of which not one acre is owned by any one of its members—assumes through its council the right to force a government on these people which they may not want nor which they may not approve.

"The council issues its charters much as the English kings granted them for the colonial exploitation of America. The council, the nine men in Geneva, in the last analysis, handle the whole affair. They issue the mandate, they prescribe its 'explicit' terms, they appoint a permanent commission to receive and examine the annual reports of the mandatories and to advise the council as to the observance of the mandates. The nine men in Geneva are the 'whole show,' in this as in every other article; the assembly is no more considered than if it had been dead several years.

"The mandatories are to force an unwilling civilization and an alien code of morals and ethics on peoples to whom the whole thing may be repulsive. Their wishes are not consulted in the least; the nine men in Geneva assume dictatorship over them in every detail—a benevolent dictatorship, it may be claimed, but containing the seeds of a monopoly and tyranny that may prove dangerous. You may say this is foolish fancy, an alarmist seeing red. Then read this, just as a simple instance, from article 22, paragraph 5, 'and will also secure equal trade opportunities for the trade and commerce of other members of the league.' [The italics are ours.] By what right does the council limit the equality of opportunities to its members and thus bar out the rest of the world? And this in the interests of world peace!

"The whole scheme of mandatories as here planned is wrong. Even in Paris, before the league had been approved and accepted, the rush for the spoils began. Such a question was too big to be settled offhand by a few men. Jealousies have already begun, just a foretaste of what is to come. Belgium is feeling sore that German East Africa, for which she felt she had special rights, was given to Great Britain. Italy wanted a mandatory, but when she left the conference and later returned in the person of Premier Orlando, he found the last of the mandatories Italy might take had been disposed of. The watermelon had been cut and distributed.

"It may be obtruding a shameless commercialism into a meeting of idealism and altruism, but one might perhaps be permitted to ask, 'Does the mandatory pay all its own expenses?' The covenant does not refer to this pecuniary problem at all. We turn to the dictionary for help and find that a mandatory is 'one who undertakes, without compensation, to do service for another, with regard to property placed in his hands by the other.' Of course the last three words do not apply here, but that is a detail. But what is not yet clear is that while the mandatory does not charge for his services are his actual disbursements and expenses to be paid; and if so, by whom?

"The two lemons that the league desires to hand to the United States are the Constantinople and Armenian mandates. We are asked to cast ourselves headlong into this tainted mess of lying, corruption, diplomacy, of sedition, intrigue, jealousies, Turkish secret working and tricking to regain control, Russian Bolshevism, and religious warfare. We are asked to accept the guardianship of these peoples whose territory is the cesspool of Europe, with internal and external discords that have been a stench in the nostrils of Europe for a century.

"The United States is to be the Don Quixote, setting forth on a glorious mission to redeem the world. This work in Turkey might cost us many millions, even billions, before we are through. What would be our relation to the national debt? How many lives of our sons would we have to pay to battle with the countless opposing forces in this troubled and benighted country? Is Russia, that wanted Turkey for herself, to accept calmly our government of it? Would any one nation in the world be satisfied with our method? No; they would all be condemnatory and critical where we failed, bitterly envious were we to succeed.

"32. WHEN FRANCE EXPRESSES HER CONTEMPT FOR THE LEAGUE.

"Truly, the big nations of Europe do not take much stock in the league of nations. Italy wants Fiume for her protection on the Adriatic. Why would she want it for this reason or would she put her demand on this ground if she really believed in the league? England shows no enthusiasm; her deep interest is in the peace treaty. France, not satisfied with her new territorial defense against the possible invasion from a prostrate, crushed, and impotent Germany, guaranteed helpless as a babe for decades, wants a pact with Great Britain and the United States to come at once to her aid if attacked by her old enemy. Under the covenant France would have over 30 nations, and these include the two with which she asks the pact, pledged to fight for her if her territory were invaded.

"Could there be a more contemptuous fling in the face of the league of nations? France, who knows the league from the inside, has heard all the discussions and is acquainted with every detail of the covenant from A to Z—all of which we, the people of America, know nothing—treats the league as a weak joke or an elaborate visionary scheme on paper, at which she laughs quietly in her sleeve. France, devastated, impoverished, stricken, and suffering, lying open to any enemy after her heroic struggle, the one nation that has most to gain from the league, sniffs at it. If France believed in this league, she could rest in perfect calm and peace at night, sure that her 'territorial integrity' and her 'political independence' were safe and guaranteed forever.

"What France says in effect when she demands the pact with the two greatest powers in the world is this: 'Just give me one good old-fashioned, reliable treaty with the United States and Great Britain that they will stand by me against one enemy and it will count more than all the covenant promises of over 30 nations to defend me from all enemies.' The demand of France is not courteous nor complimentary, but it does show good, sound common sense.

"33. WHEN ONE FOREIGNER COULD PREVENT THE UNITED STATES FROM SIGNING A TREATY.

"Under the terms of the proposed treaty with France, by which the United States and Great Britain pledge themselves to go to the defense of France if she should ever be attacked by Germany, the treaty must be ratified by the nine men in Geneva. Suppose that the United States were not merely willing to sign this treaty but were intensely anxious to sign it, their will might be set aside by the opposing vote of one man in the voting of the council, which, under the covenant, must be unanimous.

"34. COVENANT OF THE LEAGUE IRRECONCILABLY ANTAGONISTIC TO MONROE DOCTRINE.

"Our Monroe doctrine and the covenant of the league of nations are in direct irreconcilable antagonism. If we sign the covenant as now phrased, we kill the Monroe doctrine. The pen that signs the covenant automatically kills the doctrine. Here is the proof:

"The opponents of the first constitution of the league of nations demanded recognition of the Monroe doctrine. Will this grudging, misleading, and meaningless paragraph satisfy the Senators and other leading men of the Nation who are attempting to stand bravely by the Monroe doctrine? Note the wording: 'Nothing in this covenant shall be deemed to affect the validity of international agreements, such as treaties of arbitration or regional understandings like the Monroe doctrine, for securing the maintenance of peace.' Those that prepared this article 21, by misclassifying the Monroe doctrine as among 'regional understandings' either through ignorance that is unbelievable or through willful perversion that is cunning, nullify their recognition of 'validity.' It becomes absolutely worthless.

"The Monroe doctrine can be roughly epitomized in the statement, 'The United States will not interfere in the affairs of Europe, nor will it tolerate European interference in the affairs of the two American Continents.' This is not a 'regional understanding.' The Monroe doctrine is unilateral, a mere statement of the attitude of mind of the Nation. It is not a law, a treaty, nor an agreement. It is but a declaration of the point of view of the United States of its determination to safeguard its national peace and security. This is one sided; an understanding is two sided, implying the acceptance of a declaration of one by another.

"What is the specific Monroe doctrine, whose 'validity' is evasively recognized in the covenant? Is it the declaration made by President Monroe in his message to Congress in December, 1823—just this and nothing more? But the Monroe doctrine is more than this. It means all that nearly a century of tradition and interpretation has put into it. For 'Europe' it now substitutes the Eastern Hemisphere, for we would apply it to Asia and Africa, as well as to Europe. The Monroe doctrine means whatever the United States at any time declares it to be, by its own interpretation alone, in accord with the big spirit of its purpose.

"In the future the league of nations may, in spite of its acknowledgment of mere 'validity,' be called upon by some foreign power to interpret the doctrine. Were the league to do this, the doctrine, as thus interpreted, would no longer represent our thinking, no longer be our Monroe doctrine.

"Suppose that Japan were to purchase part or all of Lower California from Mexico. We should naturally construe this, under the Monroe doctrine, as an 'unfriendly act.' The dispute might bring us to the point of war. Should we refer this dispute to the nine men in Geneva? If so, what is the use of the Monroe doctrine? Should we take it into our own hands and go to war, what would be the status of the league toward two of the members of the council at war with each other in direct antagonism to the spirit and purpose of the league? If we claim the exclusive right to decide certain questions for the two American Continents under the Monroe doctrine, then this exclusive right can not be shared with others nor exercised by them.

"Another and more serious phase of the question is this: What matters the approval and support of the Monroe doctrine by the league if we ourselves abrogate it? How can we become members of the league under its covenant and yet preserve the Monroe doctrine, when mere membership is in direct opposition to the doctrine? The opening lines of President Monroe's pronouncement read: 'In the wars of the European powers in matters relating to themselves we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy so to do. It is only when our rights are invaded or seriously menaced that we resent injuries or make preparation for our defense.' How, in the face of this declaration and in loyalty to it, can the United States sign an agreement that binds us in honor to take part in every dispute between nations not only in Europe but all over the world and to enter into war at any call of the nine men in Geneva, even where neither 'our rights are invaded nor seriously menaced'?

"If we sign the league of nations covenant we ipso facto tear up the Monroe doctrine. Our action would be as foolish and as contradictory as that of a man declaring that he would never take another drink and some time later signing an agreement solemnly binding himself 'to take a drink whenever and wherever called upon so to do.' Then suppose that, merely to make himself feel he is not forsaking his principles, he secures a clause in his agreement to the effect that 'nothing in this agreement to drink whenever and wherever so called upon shall be deemed to affect the validity of the earlier declaration never to take another drink.'

"Are the American people or their representatives so blinded by optimism, idealism, altruism, and belief in this particular league of nations as the only means of safeguarding world peace that they will be fooled into believing that there is no irreconcilable antagonism between the covenant and the Monroe doctrine? If the present covenant be so perfect, so wondrous, so effective a guaranty of world peace that we must sign it, and that it as an untried plan is superior to our tested Monroe doctrine, let us by all means sign. But let us do it with our eyes open and let us then consign the weak, worn, and outlived Monroe doctrine to oblivion and prepare ourselves as a Nation and as a people to ignore our national conscience and to live only in accord with the leading and decision of the nine men in Geneva.

"35. THE COVENANT IS IRRECONCILABLY ANTAGONISTIC TO THE CONSTITUTION.

"The covenant of the league of nations contravenes, so far as we are concerned, the Constitution of the United States. It is unconstitutional. If we sign it, the action being unconstitutional, the signing is of no avail. The people can not surrender any inherent power committed to them by the Constitution except by constitutional amendment. To sign this covenant is to make such a surrender. If for no other single reason than this, the United States Senate should repudiate this covenant and refuse to sign it because of its unconstitutionality. Here is the proof that the covenant is unconstitutional:

"Congress has under the Constitution the power to regulate 'commerce with foreign nations.' If this means anything, it means that what Congress decides shall be the final judgment in our relation in trade. But if the nine men in Geneva declare that (under article 16) we can have no trade with Russia, Japan, or some other country, that we can neither receive imports from her nor send exports to her; when we accept this command to sever trade relations with a country that has done us no wrong or against whom we have no grievance, when we submit to this dictation from an extraconstitutional body, when we are thus forced into a sympathetic international strike and trade boycott against any country, then the Congress has no longer full power to regulate our 'commerce with foreign nations,' and any carte blanche agreement to submit to this is unconstitutional.

"Congress has under the Constitution the power to provide and maintain a navy. This means as an essential that it is Congress that is to decide the character, number, and size of that navy. If the nine men in Geneva are to decide this for us, then the agreement that compels submission is unconstitutional.

"Congress has 'the power to raise and support armies, but no appropriation to that shall be for a longer term than for two years.' This implies as an essential that Congress, not nine men in Geneva, shall determine the size of that army. According to article 16 of the covenant, in the event of a world war, we pledge ourselves to support one another in financial and economic measures, etc., practically signing a blank check for our own expenses and whatever nations we might have to help, knowing nothing of the amount, where we have no option in the spending, and under the conditions that we have bound ourselves to do this to 'preserve the territorial integrity and political independence' of any or all of 40 or 50 nations. Is this in accord with the wisdom of the fathers in writing our Constitution to limit Congress to a two years' appropriation? This, too, is unconstitutional.

"Congress has the power 'to declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water.' Under the Constitution Congress has the final power to determine whether the United States shall or shall not go into war. It has no right to delegate this power to nine men in Geneva. Any delegation of this power is not merely voidable; it is void.

"Suppose a treaty were made between the United States and England wherein occurred these words: 'The United States agrees to go into war only when so directed by Great Britain.' Would the Senate accept this as constitutional? It would be said, of course, that the decision to go into war or to remain out of war rests with Congress alone. If such a treaty would be unconstitutional when negotiated with a single nation, would it suddenly become constitutional if made with a number of nations combined into a single body?

"The Constitution of the United States, in Article VI, section 2, says: 'The Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof and all treaties which shall be made under the authority of the United States shall be the supreme law of the land.' Should the Senate accept any treaty of peace incorporating the covenant of the league of nations as given, then the signing is not in accord with the Constitution of the United States.

"Either the Constitution of the United States is superior to the covenant of the league of nations or the covenant is paramount over the Constitution. In the first instance the covenant being in antagonism to the Constitution, the covenant must be set aside and remain unsigned. If the covenant be accepted and signed and sustained, then the Constitution of the United States goes into the discard.

"The powers of Congress as given in section 8 of the Constitution are intrusted to it alone; it has no power to surrender them or to abrogate them; it has merely power to execute them as need demands. If the American people desire to take these powers from the American Congress in order that we may in the future be guided in our international relations by the nine men in Geneva, then the only proper and effective step is to amend our Constitution so that we may at least retain part of a noble document that has sustained us in over 130 years of our national history.

"36. WHEREIN THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS IS BASICALLY WRONG AND UNSOUND.

"Some of the weaknesses in the covenant of the league of nations are due to its ambiguities, its obscurities, its omissions, its inadequacies, its contradictions, its unwarranted assumptions. But the serious part is that the league is wrong basically, fundamentally, organically. These wrongs can not be righted by any minor corrections; they would demand radically changing the character of the league itself and writing an entirely new covenant.

"The league of nations is not a league of nations, for this means 'a league of peoples united under governments.' It is a league of governments. It is not truly even this, for a league of governments suggests a league of sovereign States, equal by virtue of their sovereignty, with equal voices and equal rights. This is a league of the war allies, a league of the great powers, a league of the governments of the supreme military powers of the world. Whatever it may be, it is not a league of nations.

"This league of nations is not based on democracy; it is based on autocracy, and a military autocracy at that. The word 'democracy' or 'democratic' never once occurs in the 26 articles of the covenant; there is no breath of it, no spirit of it, no suggestion of it, from beginning to end. The word 'people' or 'peoples' never once is mentioned except in article 22, referring to the peoples of territory that neither belong to the league nor to any member of the league, but which the league, through its mandatories, is to govern. The league does not represent democracy; it is a plutocratic oligarchy.

"This league of nations does not treat even its own members fairly. It gives practically no true representation to nearly three-quarters of its members, for the assembly has been shown as an impotent body with permission to amuse itself by talking while the nine men in Geneva 'run the show.' Five great powers are perpetual members of the council; four other powers are to be added to their number. These four are temporary, subject to change. After the league gets really started, for how long will the 'members represented on the assembly' be satisfied to do just as they are told, with no voice in the telling?

"This league of nations is a supergovernment, yet the frailty and insecurity of its delegated powers forces it to wabble in its statements in every instance in the covenant where it attempts to take a bold stand. The fallacy of it all is that it has no absolute power except as this rests on the loyalty of 30 or 40 nations to mere promises. Whenever the pressure or inconvenience is too great the promises will snap. The league attempts to do many things which no nation would dare to do, which it would recognize as in opposition to international law, which would lead to war if it dared to do it, yet the nation has inherent power which this new supergovernment has not. Much of the power this league has under its covenant is because the people of the world have been hypnotized by the name of the league, by their belief that it can end war, and they fail to realize the full extent of their sovereignty that they are delegating.

"This league of nations has for its one real reason for being its claim to prevent war. It is this claim that has so caught the popular imagination that it has in countless instances assumed that the plan itself is therefore good. If you were asked to buy stock in a company just organized to put a new fire extinguisher on the market, your first question might well be, 'Will it put out fires?' Should you find that it does not put out fires, but is likely to kindle them, you do not invest. The covenant of the league of nations does not prove that it can put out the fires of war, but it does show in many places that it is likely to kindle them.

"That this league of nations has these basic weaknesses does not prove that the world would not be the better for a real league, a league on different lines, based on bringing the nations together in a safe, sound, practical way of conference and united wisdom rather than of a futile attempt at world government by nine men in Geneva. This is neither the time nor place to present even an outline of the better way; that must wait till America has realized that the league of nations is not the right way and that it has not even the foundation upon which that right way can be built.

"37. RATIFYING THIS COVENANT GRANTS A MONOPOLY TO ONE PLAN FOR ENDING WAR.

"The league of nations is an untried experiment; it has weaknesses, obscurities, self-evident evils, and it can not guarantee to end war. Should one or more of the great powers break away from it or a number of the smaller ones withdraw or be expelled, the organization would still persist. It did not originate in a meeting of representatives of all nations getting together at a time when, free from the consideration of other questions, all possible plans could be suggested and discussed calmly, leisurely, and in perfect freedom. It was created in an atmosphere of jealousies, intrigue, suspicion, and selfish aims and interests by a few men who were seeking to accomplish the solution of two appalling problems simultaneously.

"Once committed to this scheme the world grants a perpetual charter to this one plan, a monopoly of the preservation of world peace to this one league. In a few months the league, with its rigid covenant, would have so involved and obligated the nations that a new better way could not be tried. There is a better way to prevent war and to secure permanent world peace. Is the United States willing to sign away in perpetuity its right to the better way? Article 4 states that the United States shall be represented in the council. Were we to repudiate this covenant by failure to ratify it is extremely doubtful if the league could proceed without amending the covenant; this might take many months.

"There is no immediate impelling need to pledge ourselves to this league, as the one only final method of preserving peace, especially as this covenant opens up more avenues for breeding war than for killing it. Never was the world so safe for any serious war, for a year at least, as at the present time. One single year would be long enough to have the world practically guaranteed against war by the better way, without the entanglements incidental to this complicated machine with its self-evident dangers and its subtle menace.

"38. FAILURE TO UNDERSTAND COVENANT MAKES RATIFICATION A NATION'S PLUNGE INTO THE DARK.

"This document, perhaps the most important and most potential for good or evil that the world has ever known, has been drawn with a carelessness and slovenliness that would be unpardonable in the simplest commercial contract. The covenant is filled with inaccuracies, ambiguities, vague phrases possible of different interpretations, contradictions, and occasional generalities that may mean much or nothing; there are vital omissions where we can but guess at what was intended, places where two equally keen minds would find antagonistic meanings.

"Were the Senate to ratify this covenant it would in reality be ratified in the dark. Once committed to it by the ratification of the Senate, the United States would have to stand by any interpretation that might be given of any word, phrase, or paragraph. There is no court in the world having power to construe it nor to determine its meaning. It will be interpreted by the members of the league that are to exercise power under it—the nine men in Geneva, the council. From what they say or decide there is no appeal; their rendering is final and absolute. The Senate of the United States could not amend it in any way to untangle its entanglements and to make every point clear without practically rewriting the whole document.

"39. INIQUITOUS PRESSURE BROUGHT TO BEAR ON THOSE OPPOSING THE LEAGUE.

"There is an unfair and unjustified pressure being brought to bear by many favoring the peace treaty with its covenant of the league of nations upon the Senate of the United States and upon public opinion. There is an attempt to stampede ratification by threats of what will happen should we not ratify. They flaunt a bugaboo of the long deferred peace that would follow our refusal to accept the treaty part and the chaos that would come to Europe were the league not approved.

"The emptiness of all this threatening and terrorizing is that even if the Senate were to reject the treaty altogether the signing by the Allies would give to them all they are asking. Congress can, without an hour's delay, declare that the 'state of war thrust upon' this country, as it declared on April 2, 1917, no longer exists. We were not party to the agreement between the Allies not to make a separate peace, for we entered the war independently. The treaties of peace that the United States need to make would be so simple that Germany and Austria would not hesitate a moment after accepting the treaty with the Allies. The Senate of the United States will not consent to be dragooned into taking action that it may decide is not what it deems right to take. Such tactics on the part of those who are using them are unfair, coercive, iniquitous, and an unwise attempt to mislead and fool the American people.

"40. FIRST DUTY OF THE SENATE REGARDING THE TWO DOCUMENTS IN ONE.

"The Senate of the United States is asked to ratify the treaty of peace, incorporated in which is the covenant of the league of nations. It is in reality the two most important documents the world has ever known united in one. They have required months of consideration in preparation and drafting. One is to settle our present war; the other aims, so far as is humanly possible, to prevent future war. They are essentially different in purpose. To consider the two together means injustice to one or to both. Either one may be sacrificed for the other.

"The first duty of the Senate, it would seem, is to cut the Gordian knot of difficulty by separating the two, and giving its earliest attention to the treaty as the more immediate of the two documents. This would necessitate amendments to connect the loose ends incident to separating the treaty from the interrelated covenant. Then with whatever other amendments, reservations, or other action the Senate might make the treaty might be ratified and our present war conditions would be ended, and the world would be put in a condition to start afresh and to face the future.

"With the treaty thus settled the Senate would have time, carefully, calmly, unhurriedly, and uncoerced by pressure, to consider the covenant in every detail.

"41. APPALLING PRICE AMERICA WOULD PAY WERE SHE TO RATIFY THIS COVENANT.

"For more than 130 years the United States has been independent as a Nation. She has grown powerful, prosperous, and influential as a union of free people. With the courage and pride of her individuality she has been working out her own destiny in her own way, neither interfering with the rights of other nations nor tolerating interference with rights exclusively her own. She has not lived a life of selfish isolation, but has offered an asylum for the poor and oppressed of all peoples, and her hand and her wealth have ever been ready at the call of every great human need abroad as truly as at home. She has become a world power because she has not sought world power. Whatever she has done has been her voluntary act performed in accord with her national conscience, which has been kept at home, not put into pawn to any foreign power nor any syndicate of powers.

"But now we are asked to change all this. We are asked to trade the Aladdin's lamp of our nationalism which has proved to be such a treasure for a newfangled contraption of a cheap, hastily-constructed, foreign-made lamp of internationalism. For a tried, tested, and true reality we are urged to substitute a dream. For a rich and certain estate now in our hands we are asked to accept the blue prints of some imaginary city of wondrous glory. For our birthright of freedom and independent government they want us to take the mess of pottage of this paper scheme of slavery to nine men in Geneva. Let America's answer be brief and final: 'Gentlemen, we have studied your elaborate prospectus, but we do not like it, and we decline to invest.'

"We are to sit with eight other men as a super-Government, meddling in the affairs of all nations, passing judgment with the finality of suddenly acquired omniscience on the disputes of all, acting as arbiter of the morals of all, constituting ourselves trustees of the destinies of the world. Has America made such an astounding success of her own problems in the past? Has she mastered the appalling problems that confront us at home at this very hour? Has she, with such infinite wisdom, guided chaotic Mexico into ways of good government that we are now sublimely equipped to join in the 'benevolent' autocracy of the whole world?

"Let us look the facts coldly, clearly, and calmly squarely in the face. Europe does not want the United States just for ourselves, through her deep affection for us, she wants us for our money, our men, our ships, our initiative, our infinite resources. There are those that try to seduce us with the alluring and deceptive cry that 'America must take her part in the affairs of the world.' Yes; but America must be her own judge of what she will do, where she will do it, when she will do it, and how she will do it. It must be by her voluntary act; she must be moved and inspired from within, not dictated to, directed, and controlled from without; she must play the game herself, not become a mere pawn in the hands of other players.

"Article 16 says: 'The members of the league agree further that they will mutually support one another in the financial and economic measures, etc.' With Europe on the verge of bankruptcy and starvation, what would this mean? It would mean that the United States would pay not only her own share but that of many other States, who either could not nor would not put up their quota. It reads smoothly enough on paper, but we had one domestic experience which should prove illuminating. At the time of the American Revolution every State was pledged to do its part and to furnish its quota of force and money, but many States failed to make good, and the burden fell on the others. A similar situation occurred in our War of 1812, when the States of New England refused to put their State troops at the disposal of the Federal Government. Yet we are asked to depend absolutely on the myriad promises, stated and implied, in this covenant.

"America has, in all the multiform activities of the league, the least to gain and the most to lose in every single respect and from every point of view that can be considered. If the United States ratified this covenant she would fulfill her pledges. Her very earnestness and enthusiasm would inspire other nations to hold back; America would be willing to do her part, and other nations would permit her to do her part—and theirs, too. 'Let George do it' has its international as well as its social application. Are we so anxious to assume the rôle of pulling the European chestnuts out of the fire that we will accept the singeing that is guaranteed and inevitable?

"Were the United States to enter this league it would soon become the most cordially hated nation in the world. Our very power would generate jealousies and envies; we would be severely criticized and condemned alike for what we would do or leave undone. For every failure we would be blamed, yet in every emergency we would be called on for money, men, or other resources. This tendency has already manifested itself with many of the powers; from suspicion, doubt, and fear it is but a short step to hate. If we throw ourselves headlong into this maze of intrigue, diplomacy, and international problems we shall deserve all we get. As the separate points of this dissection and analysis of this covenant are studied, and when all the strong points made by others are considered, the question no longer is: 'What satisfactory reasons can be given why America should not go into this league?' but 'What one real satisfying reason can be given why she should go in?'"

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 6th instant approved and signed the act (S. 180) to incorporate Near East Relief.

TREATY WITH FRANCE.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Is it in order to call up the resolution I submitted some days ago?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Unless there is further morning business it is in order. The Chair hears none.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I ask that Senate resolution 154 may be read and considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 154, submitted by Mr. WALSH of Montana on the 5th instant, as follows:

Whereas doubts have been expressed as to the authority of the treaty-making power under the Constitution to enter into the treaty with France, submitted to the Senate for ratification on the 29th day of July, 1919: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and it hereby is, requested to inquire and advise the Senate as to whether there are any constitutional obstacles to the making of the said treaty.

Mr. KELLOGG. With the permission of the Senator from Montana, I should like to address some remarks to the question of the resolution and the league of nations and the peace treaty generally.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I shall be very glad to yield to the Senator from Minnesota for that purpose.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gay	McCormick	Robinson
Ball	Gerry	McCumber	Sheppard
Bankhead	Gronna	McKellar	Shields
Brandegee	Hale	McNary	Smith, Ariz.
Calder	Harding	Moses	Smoot
Capper	Harris	Myers	Sterling
Chamberlain	Henderson	Nelson	Sutherland
Culberson	Hitchcock	New	Swanson
Curtis	Johnson, S. Dak.	Newberry	Thomas
Dial	Jones, N. Mex.	Nugent	Townsend
Dillingham	Kellogg	Overman	Trammell
Elkins	King	Page	Wadsworth
Fall	Kirby	Phelan	Walsh, Mass.
Fernald	Knox	Phipps	Walsh, Mont.
Fletcher	La Follette	Pittman	Watson
France	Lenroot	Poindexter	Williams
Frelinghuysen	Lodge	Ransdell

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence on account of official business of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

I also wish to announce that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], and the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] are detained on public business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, it is my intention at this time to address myself, at least partially, to the resolution heretofore submitted by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], calling upon the Judiciary Committee of the Senate for an expression of opinion as to the constitutionality of the proposed treaty of alliance with France; and as that treaty embraces in principle the same questions as are involved in the league of nations, I beg leave of the Senate to submit some observations upon that question.

I shall at this time discuss two propositions: First, whether the league of nations is within the treaty-making power of the President and the Senate under the Constitution of the United States; and, second, whether reservations in and amendments of the covenant are necessary to protect the United States.

As an appendix to my remarks I ask to have printed in the RECORD some reservations which have been prepared by certain Senators as suggestions in relation to the pending treaty.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, the covenant of the league of nations has been before the people of the United States for practically six months. It has probably been discussed in the Senate, in the forum of the people, and in the press of the country more than any instrument ever submitted since the Jay treaty. I believe every Senator has made up his mind how he intends to vote.

The peace treaty, the most momentous document ever submitted to any body, has been before the Committee on Foreign Relations nearly a month; and, while I am making no criticism of that committee, I am stating what I believe to be the public sentiment of this country when I say that there is a strong desire that this treaty and the league of nations covenant, bringing an end of this war, shall be disposed of at the earliest possible moment. The Nation has made great sacrifices; its sons have given their lives upon the fields of France; industry and commerce have been disarranged; the people wish this issue settled and that our attention be turned to the economic problems which always follow a great world convulsion such as we have passed through.

I should not take the time of the Senate to discuss even these questions were it not for the fact that the peace treaty is still before the Foreign Relations Committee, and there is no legislation immediately pending before the Senate, since it is now being considered in the committees of Congress.

I am aware that the discussion of a constitutional question is a very dry subject and interests very few people, but I take it that no Senator desires or would for one moment think of voting for a treaty that he believes to be beyond the constitutional power of the Government simply because it would do no harm.

From an examination of the speeches made by certain Senators and from declarations in the press I assume that the provisions of the covenant which are declared to be in violation of the Constitution are:

Article 8, providing for the reduction of national armaments, and stipulating that the manufacture by private enterprise of munitions and implements of war is open to grave objection;

Article 10, providing that members of the league agree to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league;

Article 11, providing that any war or threat of war shall be a matter of concern to the whole league, and that the league shall take any action that may be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace of nations;

Article 16, providing that any member of the league resorting to war in disregard of its covenants under certain articles shall suffer the severance of all trade or financial relations and the prohibition of all intercourse by its nationals; and

Other provisions of the covenant providing for mandates in relation to the freedom in transit and equitable treatment of commerce.

I shall not now discuss the wisdom of these provisions—whether they should be amended or whether, if the treaty is ratified, certain reservations should be made which we believe will protect this country, although, perhaps, I ought to say that one of those questions I shall later consider in the course of my remarks. The immediate question, however, to which I now invite attention is the constitutional power of this Government to agree to respect or to guarantee the independence of any country or agree to the limitation of armament or make a treaty containing provisions which may affect our trade and commerce.

SOURCE AND SCOPE OF TREATY-MAKING POWER.

When the Constitution of the United States was adopted the treaty-making power was conferred upon the President and the Senate. The provisions of the Constitution are as follows:

No State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation. * * * (Art. I, sec. 10, cl. 1.)

No State shall, without the consent of Congress, * * * enter into any agreement or compact with another State or with a foreign power. * * * (Art. I, sec. 10, cl. 2.)

He (the President) shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur. * * * (Art. II, sec. 2, cl. 2.)

The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority. * * * (Art. III, sec. 2, cl. 1.)

This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof; and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding. (Art. VI, cl. 2.)

In this broad grant of power there is embodied no definition of the subjects embraced within the treaty-making power. It may, therefore, be accepted that the people of the United States intended to confer upon the Federal Government no less power than was at the time exercised and enjoyed by other nations. In fact, not only by practice but by authority the treaty-making power has been held to embrace all those subjects which it has been the practice and custom of nations to exercise. These include treaties of alliance, both offensive and defensive; guaranties of political independence and territorial integrity; agreements as to colonies; agreements to neutralize territories and nations; treaties affecting the status of foreign citizens in this country, their right to engage in business, to own, transfer, and inherit property; questions of customs and duties, navigation of rivers, lakes, and internal waterways; the limitation of armament; the acquisition of territory; the settlement and payment of damages; and other subjects too numerous here to mention.

The men who framed the Constitution were versed in the history and practice of nations and in international law. They were students of government. Had it been intended to limit the sovereign power of the United States in the exercise of the usual treaty-making rights such restrictions would have been stated in the Constitution. In fact, in limiting the States it was provided that they should not enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation, but no limitation was placed in the Federal Constitution. It is impossible for me to recite to the Senate the declarations of the statesmen of that time in the formation of the Constitution and its adoption by the several States or the discussions which early in the history of this Government dwelt upon the treaty-making power. But those discussions make it perfectly clear that the Constitution was intended to confer upon the Federal Government the same general treaty-making power exercised by other nations, limited only by the express provisions of our Constitution. Furthermore, from the very inception of our Government to the present time we have placed a practical construction upon this power, and the Supreme Court of the United States has held that where there exists ambiguity or doubt, or where two views may well be entertained, contemporaneous and practical construction of constitutional powers are entitled to the greatest weight. (McPherson v. Blacker 146 U. S., 1; Knowlton v. Moore, 178 U. S., 41.)

"TREATY OF ALLIANCE WITH FRANCE, 1778."

At the time the Constitution was adopted it was the practice of nations to enter into treaties of alliance, offensive and defensive; guarantee countries against internal aggression; enter into treaties of commerce affecting duties on exports as well as imports and regulating other phases of commerce; fixing the status of foreign citizens and defining their property rights; acquire territory or colonies; and exercise various other treaty-making powers. In fact, before our Constitution was adopted and during the struggle for independence the Confederation of States entered into a treaty with France for an offensive and defensive alliance. Article 1 of this treaty provided as follows:

If war should break out between France and Great Britain during the continuance of the present war between the United States and England, His Majesty and the said United States shall make it a common cause and aid each other mutually with their good offices, their counsels, and their forces, according to the exigence of conjunctures, as becomes good and faithful allies.

Article 8 provides as follows:

Neither of the two parties shall conclude either truce or peace with Great Britain without the formal consent of the other first obtained; and they mutually engage not to lay down their arms until the independence of the United States shall have been formally or tacitly assured by the treaty or treaties that shall terminate the war.

Article 11, in part, provides as follows:

The two parties guarantee mutually from the present time and forever against all powers, to wit, the United States to His Most Christian Majesty the present possessions of the Crown of France in America as well as those which it may acquire in the future treaty of peace. And His Most Christian Majesty guarantees on his part to the United States their liberty, sovereignty, and independence.

This treaty was in existence until 1798 and subsisted after the adoption of the Constitution. Hamilton, in his letters discussing the treaty-making power under the Federation and under the Constitution, referred to this treaty as an evidence of the power granted by the Constitution of the United States to enter into a treaty of alliance. Among other things, he said:

The manner of exercising a similar power under the confederation shall now be examined.

To judge of the similarity of the power it will be useful to quote the terms in which it was granted. They are these: "The United States in Congress assembled shall have the sole and exclusive right and power of entering into treaties and alliances: Provided, That no treaty of commerce shall be made whereby the legislative power of the respective States shall be restrained from imposing such imposts and duties on foreigners as their own people are subject to or from prohibiting the importation or exportation of any species of commodities whatsoever."

It will not be disputed that the words "treaties and alliances" are of equivalent import and of no greater force than the single word "treaties." An alliance is only a species of treaty, a particular of a general; and the power of "entering into treaties," which terms confer the authority under which the former Government acted, will not be pretended to be stronger than the power "to make treaties," which are the terms constituting the authority under which the present Government acts; it follows that the power respecting treaties under the former and that under the present Government are similar.

* * * * * * *

Under this power thus granted and defined the alliance with France was contracted, guaranteeing, in the case of a defensive war, her West India possessions, and when the casus fœderis occurs obliging the United States to make war for the defense of those possessions, and consequently to incur the expenses of war.

Under the same power treaties of commerce were made with France, The Netherlands, Sweden, and Prussia. Besides that, every treaty of commerce is necessarily a regulation of commerce between the parties, it has been shown, in the antecedent comparison of those treaties with that lately negotiated, that produce the specific effects of restraining the legislative power from imposing higher or other duties on the articles of those nations than on the like articles of other nations, and from extending prohibition to them which shall not equally extend to other nations the most favored; and thus abridge the exercise of the legislative power to tax and the exercise of the legislative power to regulate trade.

JAY TREATY, 1794.

During the time the Constitution was pending before the conventions of the various States for adoption much of the objection to the Constitution emanated from the extensive treaty-making power conferred upon the President and the Senate. All students of history will recall the storm of opposition and public indignation which swept over the country when the terms of the Jay treaty, proclaimed February 29, 1796, between Great Britain and the United States were made public. All of the latent opposition to the Constitution was fanned into a flame and public meetings were held all over the country, at which the treaty was denounced. It was assailed in almost every aspect as being beyond the constitutional power of the President and the Senate.

It brought forth from Washington, Hamilton, Ellsworth, and many others who were familiar with the history of the formation of the Constitution and the grant of the treaty-making power the most illuminating and the ablest discussion upon this subject anywhere recorded in history.

Hamilton defended the treaty-making power in a series of letters over the signature of "Camillus," which for historical knowledge and power of logic have never been transcended. They stand as the last great monument to his fame. A brief summary of these objections may be useful:

It was alleged that the Jay treaty restricted the power of Congress to lay taxes or exact higher duties upon commodities; the power to regulate trade; the power to establish uniform naturalization; to define and punish piracies and felonies; that it violated the provision of the Constitution which declares that "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law"; that it violated the constitutional power of Congress to dispose of and make uniform rules and regulations respecting territory and other property of the United States; that it violated that provision of the Constitution relating to the judicial department, and in many other respects.

In discussing these objections, Hamilton said:

The power of treaty could not but be supposed commensurate with all these objects to which the legislative power of the Union extended, which are the proper subjects of compacts with foreign nations.

In discussing the understanding of the treaty-making power by the convention, Hamilton said:

The manner in which the power of treaty, as it exists in the Constitution, was understood by the convention in framing it and by the people in adopting it is the point next to be considered.

As to the sense of the convention, the secrecy with which their deliberations were conducted does not permit any formal proof of the opinions and views which prevailed in digesting the power of the treaty. But from the best opportunity of knowing the fact, I aver that it was understood by all to be the intent of the provision to give to that power the most ample latitude—to render it competent to all the stipulations which the exigencies of national affairs might require; competent to the making of treaties of alliance, treaties of commerce, treaties of peace, and every other species of convention usual among nations; and competent in the course of its exercise for these purposes to control and bind the legislative power of Congress. And it was emphatically for this reason that it was so carefully guarded, the cooperation of two-thirds of the Senate with the President being required to make any treaty whatever. I appeal for this with confidence to every member of the convention, particularly to those in the two Houses of Congress.

In summarizing the arguments of those who objected to the Jay treaty on constitutional grounds, he enumerated the various treaties which the United States could not enter into if the position of these objectors was correct:

The absurdity of the alleged interferences will fully appear by showing how they would operate upon the several kinds of treaties usual among nations. These may be classed under three principal heads: (1) Treaties of commerce, (2) treaties of alliance, (3) treaties of peace.

Treaties of commerce are, of course, excluded, for every treaty of commerce is a system of rules devised to regulate and govern the trade between contracting nations, invading directly the exclusive power of regulating trade which is attributed to Congress.

Treaties of alliance, whether defensive or offensive, are equally excluded, and this on two grounds:

1. Because it is their immediate object to define a case or cases in which one nation shall take part with another in war, contrary, in the sense of the objection, to that clause of the Constitution which gives to Congress the power of declaring war; and (2) because the succors stipulated, in whatever shape they may be, must involve an expenditure of money—not to say that it is common to stipulate succors in money, either in the first instance or by way of alternative. It will be pertinent to observe, incidentally, in this place that even the humane and laudable provision in the seventeenth article, which all have approved, is within the spirit of the objection, for the effect of this is to restrain the power and discretion of Congress to grant reprisals till there has been an unsuccessful demand of justice. Nothing can better illustrate the unreasonable tendency of the principle.

Treaties of peace are also excluded, or, at the least, are so narrowed as to be in the greatest number of cases impracticable. The most common conditions of these treaties are restitutions or cessions of territory, on one side or on the other, frequently on both sides—regulations of boundary, restitutions and confirmations of property, pecuniary indemnifications for injuries or expenses. It will probably not be easy to find a precedent of a treaty of peace which does not contain one or more of these provisions as the basis of the cessation of hostilities, and they are all of them naturally to be looked for in an agreement which is to put an end to the state of war between conflicting nations.

Yet they are all precluded by the objections which have been enumerated: Pecuniary indemnifications, by that which respects the appropriations of money; restitutions or cessions of territory or property, regulations of boundary, by that which respects the right of Congress to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations concerning the territory and property of the United States. It is to be observed likewise that cessions of territory are almost always accompanied with stipulations in favor of those who inhabit the ceded territory, securing personal privileges and private rights of property, neither of which could be acceded to on the principles of that objection, which relates to the power of naturalization, for this power has reference to two species of rights, those of privilege and those of property. An act allowing a foreigner to hold real estate is so far an act of naturalization, since it is one of the consequences of alienism not to be able to hold real estate.

It follows that if the objections which are taken to the treaty on the point of constitutionality are valid, the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, can make neither a treaty of commerce nor alliance, and rarely, if at all, a treaty of peace. It is probable that on a minute analysis there is scarcely any species of treaty which would not clash in some particular with the principle of those objections, and thus, as was before observed, the power to make treaties granted in such comprehensive and indefinite terms and guarded with so much precaution would become essentially nugatory.

But the construction which is combated would cause the legislative power to destroy the power of making treaties. Moreover, if the power of the executive department be inadequate to the making of the several kinds of treaties which have been mentioned, there is then no power in the Government to make them, for there is not a syllable in the Constitution which authorizes either the legislative or judiciary departments to make a treaty with a foreign nation. And our Constitution would then exhibit the ridiculous spectacle of a Government without a power to make treaties with foreign nations, a result as inadmissible as it is absurd, since, in fact, our Constitution grants the power of making treaties in the most explicit and ample terms to the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate. On the contrary, all difficulty is avoided by distinguishing the province of the two powers according to ideas which have been always familiar to us and which were never exposed to any question till the treaty with Great Britain gave exercise to subtleties of party spirit.

Chief Justice Ellsworth, who had been a member of the Federal convention and whose appointment to the Supreme Bench bears date of March 4, 1796, in a carefully prepared letter on the subject, under date of March 13, 1796, expressed similar views. He said:

The grant of the treaty-making power is in these words: "The President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall make treaties." The power goes to all kinds of treaties, because no exception is expressed, and also because no treaty-making power is elsewhere granted to others, and it is not to be supposed that the Constitution has omitted to vest sufficient power to make all kinds of treaties which have been usually made or which the existence or interests of the Nation may require.

PRECEDENTS AND AUTHORITIES RESPECTING TREATY-MAKING POWER AND SUBJECTS.

We will thus see that the understanding of those who framed and were instrumental in adopting the Constitution was that this country had power to enter into the usual treaties negotiated by sovereign powers, including treaties of alliance, treaties guaranteeing the political independence and integrity of foreign nations; in fact, this country had entered into such a treaty, which was in force before the Constitution was adopted and for years thereafter; that from that day to the present time no question has been raised respecting the power of this country to negotiate such a treaty. Not only is this supported by the best writers on constitutional law, but by the decisions of the Supreme Court and the practice of this country during the entire life of the Republic.

Willoughby, recognized as one of the best of the modern authorities on constitutional law, makes the following statement concerning the treaty-making power of the Federal Government:

The control of international relations vested in the General Government is not only exclusive but all-comprehensive. That is to say, the authority of the United States in its dealings with the foreign powers includes not only those powers which the Constitution specifically grants it but all those powers which sovereign States in general possess with regard to matters of international concern. This general authority in the United States is fairly deducible from the fact that in its dealings with other States the United States appear as the sole representative of the American people; that upon it rests, therefore, the obligation to perform all the duties which international law imposed upon a sovereign State; and that, therefore, having these duties to perform it is to be presumed to have commensurate powers. (Sec. 190.)

The power being expressly conferred by the Constitution on the President and Senate to make treaties, and there being no bounds set to their power, they are without limitation, except that they can not violate other provisions of the Constitution or invade the other departments of the Government.

In the case of Ferrioa dos Santos (2 Brock., 493), cited in Second Watson, on the Constitution, page 955, it is said:

The treaty power, as expressed in the Constitution, is in terms unlimited, except by those restraints which are found in that instrument against the action of the Government or of its departments and those arising from the nature of the Government itself and of that of the States. It would not be contended that it extends so far as to authorize what the Constitution forbids, or a change in the character of the Government or in that of one of the States, or a cession of any portion of the territory of the latter without its consent. (Fort Leavenworth Railroad Co. v. Lowe, 114 U. S., 525, 541.) But with these exceptions it is not perceived that there is any limit to the questions which can be adjusted touching any matter which is properly the subject of negotiation with a foreign country. (Per Field, J., in Geofroy v. Riggs, 133 U. S., 258, 266.)

In the same opinion it is said:

That the treaty power of the United States extends to all proper subjects of negotiation between our Government and the Governments of other nations is clear.

In Holmes v. Jennison (14 Pet. U. S., 540) Chief Justice Taney, writing the opinion of the court, said:

The power to make treaties is given by the Constitution in general terms, without any description of the objects intended to be embraced by it, and, consequently, it was designed to include all those subjects which in the ordinary intercourse of nations had usually been made subjects of negotiation and treaty and which are consistent with the nature of our institutions and the distribution of powers between the General and State Governments. And without attempting to define the exact limits of this treaty-making power or to enumerate the subjects intended to be included in it, it may safely be assumed that the recognition and enforcement of the principles of public law being one of the ordinary subjects of treaties were necessarily included in the power conferred on the General Government. * * * Indeed, the whole frame of the Constitution supports this construction (pp. 569–570).

In the case of The Cherokee Tobacco (11 Wall., 616) Judge Swayne said, at page 620:

It need hardly be said that a treaty can not change the Constitution or be held valid if it be in violation of that instrument. This results from the nature and fundamental principles of our Government. The effect of treaties and acts of Congress, when in conflict, is not settled by the Constitution. But the question is not involved in any doubt as to its proper solution. A treaty may supersede a prior act of Congress (Foster v. Neilson, 2 Pet., 314) and an act of Congress may supersede a prior treaty (Taylor v. Morton, 2 Curtis, 454; The Clinton Bridge, 1 Walworth, 155).

In Holden v. Joy (17 Wall., 243) Clifford, J., said:

Under the powers given to the President and Senate to make treaties, it must be assumed that the framers of the Constitution intended that the power should extend to all those objects which in the intercourse of nations had usually been regarded as the proper subjects of negotiation and treaty, if not inconsistent with the nature of our Government and the relations between the States and the United States.

In Holmes v. Jennison (14 Pet., 569) it was said:

The Constitution does not descend to details on the subject of treaties. It confers the power upon the President and Senate to make treaties, and this power is conferred in general and not specific terms. The power therefore includes all those matters which were the subjects of treaty at the time the Constitution was formed, providing they are consistent with the nature and provisions of the Constitution. The recognition and enforcement of the principles of public law being among the ordinary subjects of treaties were of necessity included in the power conferred upon the President and Senate to make treaties. (Cited in 2 Watson on the Constitution, p. 956.)

It is hardly necessary to enumerate the treaties involving such general provisions which have been entered into by the United States during its existence under the Constitution. Familiar examples are the Rush-Bagot agreement of 1817—made by the exchange of notes—whereby the United States and Great Britain agreed to limit their naval armament upon the lakes forming the boundaries between the United States and Canada.

The Webster-Ashburton treaty of 1842, whereby Great Britain and the United States agreed to maintain a naval force on the coast of Africa for the suppression of the slave trade, the forces of the two nations to act in concert and cooperation.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850 between Great Britain and the United States, relating to the subject of a ship canal between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, the two nations guaranteeing the neutrality of the canal and undertaking to protect it against unjust confiscation, seizure, or violence, and so forth.

The treaty of 1846 with Colombia, whereby the United States guaranteed "positively and efficaciously * * * to perfect neutrality" of the Isthmus of Panama, the treaty with Cuba, and the treaty by which we guaranteed the independence of Panama.

The treaty of 1889 with Germany and Great Britain respecting the Samoan Islands, and many others.

The treaties of arbitration are so well known that no reference is necessary. The two Hague conventions, the Hay treaties made following the first convention, and the Root treaties following the second, and, finally, the Bryan treaties of 1913 dealt so comprehensively with the whole subject of arbitration as to leave no doubt whatever concerning the uniform recognition of the ability of the treaty-making power to bind the United States to any form of agreement for the peaceful settlement of international disputes, with a corresponding covenant not to go to war over the subject of dispute until after the processes of arbitration or inquiry have been exhausted, so that, upon precedent, upon the testimony of the statesmen who framed the Constitution, and in practice there can be no doubt as to the power of this Nation to execute such guaranties, whatever may be its wisdom. In principle there is no difference between guaranteeing the independence of Panama and guaranteeing the independence of Great Britain or France. It is said that we have a proprietary interest in Panama on account of the construction of the canal. We have a proprietary interest in the canal, and it is to our benefit to have stable government on either side of the canal, and so it is to our interest to have stable governments in any country contiguous to the United States or in any part of the world which might otherwise threaten our peace. For that reason we practically guaranteed the independence of Cuba.

If this country had the power to negotiate a treaty of alliance with France—and that power has not been questioned for more than a hundred years—the power still subsists.

If we had power to enter into a treaty with Great Britain to limit armament upon the Great Lakes—the treaty with Great Britain, 1817, which power has not been questioned for more than a hundred years—we have the same power to agree with all nations at this time to limit our armament.

Another objection to the treaty is that Congress alone can declare war and establish an army and navy; that therefore it is within the sole province of Congress to decide whether we will declare war to protect a foreign country or whether we will enlist a certain number of men and provide a certain army; that, as the legislative power is alone vested in Congress, only Congress can enter into such an agreement; and that any agreement the violation of which might cause war, or any agreement to limit armament which Congress might violate, is unconstitutional. This, as Hamilton says, would practically destroy the treaty-making power of the United States.

The argument is as old as the history of treaties in this country. It was presented with great ability by the opponents of the Jay treaty and overcome by the able statesmen of that time, foremost among whom was Alexander Hamilton. From that day to the present time the question has been frequently raised in connection with treaties for the payment of money, regulating commerce, fixing import duties, regulating rights of trade with foreign countries, fixing boundaries, and various other subjects, the objection being that as the power to legislate in relation to these matters was in the entire Congress, any treaty made by the President and the Senate was therefore void. But these objections have proved unavailing and a large number of treaties have been made and ratified by the Senate where legislation was necessary to carry them into operation. For those who desire a more detailed examination of these treaties they will be found stated and analyzed in Crandall on Treaties, their making and enforcement, chapters 12 to 17, inclusive.

I can not review them all, but let me discuss a few of them:

The Jay treaty provided for the payment of money, regulated commerce, and fixed the status of foreign citizens, their right to hold and inherit property in the States, and other like provisions. President Washington took the advice of the heads of his administration—of Hamilton and others—and declined to submit the treaty to the House of Representatives.

On March 30, 1796, in his reply to a resolution from the House, President Washington said:

> As, therefore, it is perfectly clear to my understanding that the assent of the House of Representatives is not necessary to the validity of a treaty, as the treaty with Great Britain exhibits in itself all the objects requiring legislative provisions, and on these the papers called for can throw no light, and as it is essential to the due administration of the Government that the boundaries fixed by the Constitution between different departments should be preserved, a just regard to the Constitution and to the duty of my office, under all the circumstances of this case forbids a compliance with your request.

The treaty with France for the purchase of land at the mouth of the Mississippi, approved May 3, 1802, required an appropriation of $2,000,000. President Jefferson submitted the treaty to the Senate alone, and after its ratification, asked Congress to make the appropriation. A resolution requesting the President to submit the papers to the House of Representatives was defeated.

In the French treaty of July 4, 1831, it was agreed to pay to the United States 25,000,000 francs in settlement of certain claims. The treaty was signed by the French Government and the representatives of the United States and ratified by the Senate. The Chamber of Deputies of France refused to make the appropriation. The House of Representatives unanimously adopted a resolution declaring that in the opinion of the House the convention should be maintained and its execution insisted upon.

So that we ourselves have not only insisted that we have the right to make a treaty which is said to circumscribe the legislative or sovereign power of the Government, but we have invoked the same rule against others.

There are a number of these treaties entered into with the United States requiring the payment of money which have never been submitted to the Congress and which have been negotiated by the President and confirmed by the Senate. A list of these may be found on page 179, Crandall on Treaties, extending from 1796 to 1903.

In treaties involving the modification of revenue laws it has been the universal custom for the President and the Senate to negotiate such treaties, although the power to raise revenue is alone vested in the Congress, and such bills must originate in the House. This question was also determined as an incident to the Jay treaty. The discussion is very illuminating. John Forsyth, who was afterwards Secretary of State, instituted the contention in the House that legislation to administer the treaty was necessary, but he made no claim that the treaty itself was invalid. His statement is so clear on this question that I beg leave to quote therefrom:

> The basis of the bill is not the principle stated, that legislative aid is necessary to the validity of treaties. Gentlemen have exhausted their ingenuity, their time, and their eloquence in the discussion of a doctrine utterly denied by the bill and those who advocate it. The doctrine contended for is that in certain cases specified by the Constitution legislative aid is necessary to the execution of treaties. Is there no difference between the two propositions? * * * The distinction between the validity of an instrument and the execution of its provisions, between the obligation of contract and the performance of that obligation? * * * We insist not that it is the figment or shadow of a treaty but that it shall be neither more nor less than a treaty valid and obligatory as such as a contract, but not having the force of law in its operation upon the municipal concerns of this people without legislative enactment.

He makes a distinction between the carrying out of a treaty and the making of a treaty which is morally binding upon the Congress.

Heretofore there has been no tribunal in which such treaties could be judged, except the tribunal of public opinion.

The treaties with France in 1822 and 1831 providing for duties on French goods admitted into the United States were ratified and then submitted to Congress for legislation. But the Senate refused to ratify the treaty with the States of the German Zollverein, which changed the duties laid by law. Since 1854 many of the treaties affecting import duties contained a proviso that the treaty should take effect as soon as laws required to carry them into operation should be passed. For instance, in convention with Hawaiian Islands of 1875, the Senate advised ratification, "but not until a law to carry it into operation shall be passed by the Congress of the United States." A similar reservation was made in the reciprocity convention with Mexico of 1883 and various other reciprocity conventions subsequently negotiated.

In the tariff act of October 3, 1913, the President was "authorized and empowered to negotiate trade agreements with foreign nations wherein mutual concessions are made looking toward freer trade relations and further reciprocal expansion of trade and commerce: Provided, however, That said trade agreements before becoming operative shall be submitted to the Congress of the United States for ratification or rejection."

Whatever may be said respecting the propriety of the negotiation of a treaty by the President and the Senate which interferes with the tariff acts enacted by Congress, the power to negotiate such treaties is settled beyond question. My own opinion is that the wisdom of it is doubtful, and as the duty is placed upon Congress to raise revenue to support the Government, the treaty-making power should not be exercised in such a way as to infringe upon this authority. But it has been the practice of this Nation from the inauguration of its Government under the Constitution to negotiate such treaties and to simply ask Congress to pass the necessary legislation to carry them into operation.

The Supreme Court, in the so-called Insular cases, settled this question. In the case of De Lima v. Bidwell (182 U. S., 1) recovery was sought for duties paid under protest on goods brought into New York from the island of Porto Rico in 1899, after the exchange of ratification of the treaty but prior to any legislation by Congress. The court held that upon the exchange of ratification of the treaty of April 11, 1899, Porto Rico ceased to be a foreign country within the meaning of the tariff laws then existing, and that the duties were not legally exacted.

That, in effect, was a repeal of the tariff laws by this treaty.

In the Fourteen Diamond Ring case (183 U. S., 176) the same decision was reached as to the Philippine Islands. It is true, however, that in the De Lima case there was the dissenting opinion of four judges, written by Mr. Justice White, to the contrary. But the De Lima case has been reaffirmed and must now be considered as the settled law of this country. This case was cited and approved in Dorr v. United States (195 U. S., 138), and has been cited with approval by the Supreme Court since that time.

Chief Justice White based his dissent upon the ground that it was not good policy for the Government to execute a treaty affecting duties, because the responsibility for raising revenue to support the Government was placed upon the Congress. But the court held the question of propriety was for the Senate and the President to determine when they made the treaty, Congress clearly reserving the right to refuse to carry it out or to repeal the treaty if it saw fit.

In the latter case Mr. Justice Day, who delivered the opinion of the court, said:

> It may be regarded as settled that the Constitution of the United States is the only source of power authorizing action by any branch of the Federal Government. "The Government of the United States was born of the Constitution, and all powers which it enjoys or may exercise must be either derived expressly or by implication from that instrument." (Downes v. Bidwell (182 U. S., 244, 288) and cases cited.) It is equally well settled that the United States may acquire territory in the exercise of the treaty-making power by direct cession as the result of war and in making effectual the terms of peace, and for that purpose has the powers of other sovereign nations. This principle has been recognized by this court from its earliest decisions. The convention which framed the Constitution of the United States, in view of the territory already possessed and the possibility of acquiring more, inserted in that instrument, in Article IV, section 3, a grant of express power to Congress "to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States."

There is no question that the power to acquire territory, to fix boundaries and the status of the inhabitants, and to cede territory has not only been exercised many times by this Government but has been sustained as a part of the treaty-making power by the Supreme Court of the United States.

The Senator from Pennsylvania, in his speech of March 1, objects to certain articles of the treaty relating to finance and economy because the power to legislate upon interstate commerce is vested in Congress. This same objection was made to the Jay treaty and was met by the President and by many of the proponents of the treaty, conspicuous among whom was Alexander Hamilton. Hamilton said:

> This will the better appear from the entire clause. "The Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes," which is the same as if it had been said: The whole powers of regulating trade by law shall reside in Congress, except as to the trade within a State, the power to regulate which shall remain with such State. But it is clearly foreign to that mutual regulation of trade between the United States and other nations, which, from the necessity of mutual consent, can only be performed by treaty. It is, indeed, an absurdity to say that the power of regulating trade by law is incompatible with the power of regulating it by treaty, since the former can by no means do what the latter alone can accomplish; consequently, it is an absurdity to say that the legislative power of regulating trade is an exception to the power of making treaties.
> Laws are the acts of legislation of a particular nation for itself. Treaties are the acts of the legislation of several nations for themselves jointly and reciprocally. The legislative powers of one State can not reach the cases which depend on the joint legislation of two or more States. For this resort must be had to the pactitious power, or the power of treaty. This is another attitude of the subject, displaying the fallacy of the proposition that the legislative powers of Congress are exceptions to or limitations of the power of the President, with the aid of the Senate, to make treaties.

SUPERIORITY OF TREATIES OVER STATE LAWS.

There is no doubt that in the absence of a treaty or legislation by Congress the States have power to establish the status of foreign citizens as to their rights to hold and inherit property and to engage in business within their several borders. And Congress undoubtedly has the power to provide for the naturalization of foreign subjects and prescribe conditions under which they shall become citizens of the United States. Notwithstanding this, it is settled beyond dispute that the Federal Government may, by treaty, define the status of a foreign subject residing within the States, and indicate the places where he may travel, the business in which he may engage, the property he may own, both real and personal, and the disposition of such property upon his death; that such a treaty constitutes the supreme law of the land; that a State law contravening such a treaty is invalid and will be so declared by the courts in a suitable action. Certain it is that Congress may pass a law setting aside such a treaty, and that a treaty may be negotiated which shall supersede a law of Congress.

These propositions have been established by the laws of all civilized nations, by the history of all eras, by the opinion of statesmen who framed our Constitution, by the provisions of the Constitution, by the universal practice of negotiating such treaties, and finally by repeated decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and many of the State courts during a period exceeding 100 years.

If the President and the Senate can make a treaty providing for the disposition of land in a State, they may make a treaty affecting foreign commerce, continually conceding the power of Congress to denounce the treaty.

Under the Articles of Confederation the Congress entered into treaties with foreign Governments defining the status of foreign citizens within the several States, and their right to engage in business, and to own, dispose of, and inherit property, both real and personal. Such treaties were made with France, the Netherlands, Sweden, Great Britain, Morocco, and Prussia. (Treaty with France, Feb. 6, 1778, 8 U. S. Stat. L., 12; treaty with the State's General of United Netherlands, Oct. 8, 1782, 8 U. S. Stat. L., 32; treaty of peace with Great Britain, Nov. 30, 1782, 8 U. S. Stat. L., 54; treaty with Sweden, Apr. 3, 1783, 8 U. S. Stat. L., 60; treaty with Prussia, September, 1785, 8 U. S. Stat. L., 84; treaty with Morocco, Jan. 7, 1787, 8 U. S. Stat. L., 100.)

Since the adoption of the Constitution many treaties of this character have been made, such as the treaty with the Republic of Salvador in 1870 (Treaties and Conventions, p. 1537); the treaty with Peru, 1871 (Treaties and Conventions, p. 1431). In fact, nearly every one of our treaties contain provisions, varying in form, regulating some matter which is ordinarily within the jurisdiction of the State, and which, by the Constitution, is not committed to Congress other than by the treaty-making power.

That such treaties are valid and superior to the laws of the States is demonstrated by the discussions which occurred at the time the Constitution was adopted.

Time does not permit me to cite the expressions of the public men of that time, of Washington, Jefferson, Hamilton, Madison, Randolph, Pinckney, Adams, Wilson, together with the remarkable discussion of the Constitution by Hamilton, Madison, and Jay in the Federalist—a discussion which excited the admiration of statesmen the world over and compares favorably with the writings of such great students of government as Vattel, Montesquieu, Burke, Machiavelli, and Rousseau.

It is only necessary for me to cite to the Senate the various decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, holding that these treaties were not only within the treaty-making power of the Senate and the President but were superior to the laws of the various States.

Many of these decisions were rendered in the early days of the Republic, were participated in by men who were members of the Constitutional Convention and familiar with the history of the times and the objects to be attained by its adoption. I shall simply give the Senate a list of the leading cases, as follows: Elizabeth Rutgers v. Joshua Waddington, in the Mayor's Court of New York, 1784; Ware v. Hylton (3 Dall., 199); Chirac v. Chirac (2 Wheat., 259); Orr v. Hodgson (4 Wheat., 453); Fairfax's Devisee v. Hunter's Lessee (7 Cr., 603); Hughes v. Edwards (9 Wheat., 489); Hauenstein v. Lynham (100 U. S., 483); Geofroy v. Riggs (133 U. S., 263).

There have also been adjudicated cases to the same effect in the United States circuit and district courts and a large number of cases in the State courts. In fact, every State which has passed on the question has followed the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

This is also the opinion of substantially all of the writers upon the treaty-making power, with one exception—Henry St. George Tucker, of Virginia—and he bases his opinion very largely upon certain expressions contained in certain decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, notably in opinions rendered by Chief Justice Taney, in 1840, in Holmes v. Jennison (14 Pet., 540); of Justice Daniel, shortly after, in the License cases (5 How., 504); and Chief Justice Taney and Justice Grier in the Passenger cases (7 How., 283), tending to support the theory that the treaty-making power does not extend to the subjects which by the Constitution are ordinarily committed to the regulative jurisdiction of the States. In all of these cases there were opinions by several of the justices of the court, and it does not appear that the language used was approved by the majority. In fact, in the Passenger cases, the language of Chief Justice Taney was used in a dissenting opinion. These decisions, however, do not purport to overrule the earlier decisions of the court to the contrary, and have never been followed by the court since that time. They were rendered at a time, now happily past, when the country was divided by an overwhelming issue which darkened the political sky and clouded the judgment of men. This undoubtedly had its effect upon the decisions of that great court, but the later decisions have dispelled whatever doubt may have existed.

CONSTITUTIONAL EXCEPTIONS TO TREATY-MAKING POWER.

It may be said, however, that if there are no implied limitations to the treaty-making power, the President, by and with the consent of the Senate, might dismember the Union, abolish the structure of government guaranteed by the Constitution, or convey away the territory of the States. In fact, the Senator from Pennsylvania, in his speech on June 17, said that under the treaty-making power King George of England could not be made President of the United States, nor could the House of Lords be substituted for and perform the functions of the Senate of the United States, nor could the House of Commons be made to take the place of the House of Representatives.

But these arguments are not new. They were advanced time and time again in the constitutional convention and in the convention of the various States called to consider the adoption of the Constitution.

The same argument was advanced against the Jay treaty. In reply, Hamilton said:

> The only constitutional exception to the power of making treaties is that it shall not change the Constitution; which results from this fundamental maxim, that a delegated authority can not alter the constituting act, unless so expressly authorized by the constituting power. An agent can not new-model his own commission. A treaty, for example, can not transfer the legislative power to the executive department, nor the power of this last department to the judiciary; in other words, it can not stipulate that the President, and not Congress, shall make laws for the United States—that the judges, and not the President, shall command the national forces.

Undoubtedly the treaty-making power does not comprehend that the President and the Senate shall change the form of Government or stipulate to destroy any of the fundamental powers of the Federal Government which are guaranteed by provisions of the Federal Constitution coordinately with the treaty clause.

A treaty abrogating the functions of the Supreme Court of the United States or of the legislative or executive bodies would undoubtedly be declared unconstitutional, because the provisions of the Constitution creating the departments of Government are of equal force and effect with those conferring the treaty-making power.

These questions, if not settled by ballot, can only be settled by the arbitrament of war.

This question has been settled and these limitations carefully defined by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Geofroy v. Riggs (133 U. S., 258).

But because a treaty limits sovereign power—I speak of sovereign power as the power to make laws—it is not thereby invalid. The treaty-making power as between nations embraces many of the subjects which are within the legislative power of the Nation. Every treaty we negotiate to a certain extent destroys certain freedom of sovereign action. A treaty, of which we have many, conferring certain privileges of trade, is binding and, if we perform our agreement, it limits legislative action. Treaties fixing duties and providing for imports; navigation treaties; treaties defining the status of foreign subjects, their right to own and hold property; in fact, there is not a treaty which does not to some extent limit the power of the Federal Government. Of course, it is conceded that the Congress has the power to violate a treaty, and we have denounced some of our treaties. And the Supreme Court has decided that a treaty can not alter the Constitution and is void if it is in violation of that instrument. (Thomas v. Gay, 169 U. S., 264.)

But a treaty does not violate the Constitution, because a violation of a treaty may cause war. The violation of many of our treaties might cause war if the other party to the treaty so desired. Congress has no power, of course, to create a supergovernment and confer upon that government the right, without an act of Congress, to declare war.

But it is an entirely different proposition when Congress agrees to a treaty the violation of which may lead to war. By the guaranty of the political integrity of Panama, if we perform that guaranty, it may become necessary to render military service. The treaty itself, however, is valid. We can not, of course, confer upon Panama the power to declare war for the United States, but we can agree with Panama to perform acts which may involve us in war.

It is claimed that we can not enter into a treaty limiting armament, because Congress alone can raise and support armies and provide for a navy. By a treaty with Great Britain, negotiated in 1817, we agreed to limit armament on the Great Lakes. This treaty has been in existence more than 100 years, and no question has ever arisen as to its validity. If we may limit armament in a certain section we may limit it entirely. Whether it is advisable to do so is another question. It must also be remembered that we have negotiated a large number of treaties within the last 10 years, by which we agree to arbitration and to forego hostilities for periods of from three to six months. These are agreements not to make war. If the contention of certain Senators is correct that a treaty in which it is agreed to forego hostilities is void because the Congress has absolute power to declare war at any time, we have for many years been performing unconstitutional acts. In fact, any treaty would be void which Congress may violate by legislative act or which requires a legislative act before it becomes operative.

RESERVATIONS IN AND AMENDMENT OF TREATIES.

It is not my intention at this time to discuss the league of nations at length. Nor do I mean to convey the idea that all of the provisions of this league are wise and should be ratified. I have so far simply discussed the power to enter into such a treaty. The wisdom of the provisions is quite another thing. I think that some reservations might well be made not in any way detracting from the efficacy of the instrument.

The first question, therefore, which I wish to suggest is how far the Senate can go in making reservations which will not require the instrument to be resubmitted to all other signatory powers. No one doubts, of course, that the Senate has the power to make any reservations or amendments it sees fit and to make the ratification of the treaty conditional upon those reservations and amendments. There is also no question, in my opinion, that where the meaning of the instrument is at all in doubt the Senate may, by reservation, make a binding declaration construing the treaty.

However, I wish to make perfectly clear that, in my opinion, where either an amendment or a reservation clearly changes the meaning of the treaty it will require the instrument to be resubmitted to all other signatory powers. That such acceptance may be evidenced either by a formal ratification by the other signatory powers, by exchange of notes, or if not objected to by such powers, and the treaty is put into operation, such an amendment would undoubtedly be considered as having been accepted. There are cases in which such reservations do not appear to have been formally accepted by affirmative action of the other powers, but were undoubtedly tacitly accepted by putting the treaty into operation.

The effect of reservations and amendments to treaties has been considered by the Supreme Court in a number of cases: Doe v. Braden (16 How., 622); New York Indians v. United States (170 U. S. 1); Arkansas v. Kansas & Texas Coal Co. (183 U. S., 185); the Diamond Ring case (183 U. S., 176).

In Doe v. Braden (16 How., 635), the effect of a reservation as to the validity of certain grants made by the King of Spain in Florida pending the negotiation of the treaty was considered, and Chief Justice Taney, writing the opinion of the court, said:

> We have made this statement in relation to the negotiations and correspondence between the two Governments for the purpose of showing the circumstances which occasioned the introduction of the eighth article, confirming Spanish grants made before the 24th of January, 1818, and annulling those made afterwards; and also for the purpose of showing how it happened that the three large grants by name were declared to be annulled in the ratification and not by a stipulation in the body of the treaty. But the statement is in no other respect material. For it is too plain for argument that where one of the parties to a treaty at the time of its ratification annexes a written declaration explaining ambiguous language in the instrument or adding a new and distinct stipulation and the treaty is afterwards ratified by the other party with the declaration attached to it and the ratifications duly exchanged, the declaration thus annexed is a part of the treaty and as binding and obligatory as if it were inserted in the body of the instrument. The intention of the parties is to be gathered from the whole instrument as it stood when the ratifications were exchanged.

In the case of New York Indians v. United States (170 U. S., 1), a reservation adopted by the Senate, which was not submitted to the Indian tribes or published by the President as a part of the treaty, was held not binding.

Mr. Justice Brown, writing the opinion of the court, said:

> The power to make treaties is vested by the Constitution in the President and Senate, and, while this proviso was adopted by the Senate, there is no evidence that it ever received the sanction or approval of the President. It can not be considered as a legislative act, since the power to legislate is vested in the President, Senate, and House of Representatives. There is something, too, which shocks the conscience in the idea that a treaty can be put forth as embodying the terms of an arrangement with a foreign power or an Indian tribe, a material provision of which is unknown to one of the contracting parties, and is kept in the background to be used by the other only when the exigencies of a particular case may demand it. The proviso never appears to have been called to the attention of the tribes, who would naturally assume that the treaty, embodied in the presidential proclamation, contained all the terms of the arrangement. It is true that the proclamation recites that the Senate did, on March 25, 1840, resolve that the treaty, "together with the amendments proposed by the Senate of the 11th of June, 1838, have been satisfactorily acceded to and approved of by said tribes," but, as the proclamation purported to set forth the treaty "word for word" as so amended, of course the amendments referred to were those embodied in the treaty as published in the proclamation.

In the case of Fourteen Diamond Rings (183 U. S., 176), a question similar to the one in De Lima against Bidwell arose.

It appears that after the ratification of the treaty the Senate passed a resolution, by vote of 26 to 22, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That by the ratification of the treaty of peace with Spain it is not intended to incorporate the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands into citizenship of the United States, nor is it intended to permanently annex said islands as an integral part of the territory of the United States; but it is the intention of the United States to establish on said islands a government suitable to the wants and conditions of the inhabitants of said islands to prepare them for local self-government, and in due time to make such disposition of said islands as will best promote the interests of the United States and the inhabitants of said islands.

The court said:

We need not consider the force and effect of a resolution of this sort, if adopted by Congress, LOT like that of April 20, 1898, in respect of Cuba, preliminary to the declaration of war, but after title had passed by ratified cession. It is enough that this was a joint resolution; that it was adopted by the Senate by a vote of 26 to 22, not two-thirds of a quorum; and that it is absolutely without legal significance on the question before us. The meaning of the treaty can not be controlled by subsequent explanations of some of those who may have voted to ratify it. What view the House might have taken as to the intention of the Senate in ratifying the treaty we are not informed, nor is it material; and if any implication from the action referred to could properly be indulged, it would seem to be that two-thirds of a quorum of the Senate did not consent to the ratification on the grounds indicated.

Mr. Justice Brown, in a concurring opinion, stated more in detail his reasons for not giving effect to the resolution:

It can not be regarded as part of the treaty, since it received neither the approval of the President nor the consent of the other contracting power. A treaty in its legal sense is defined by Bouvier as "a compact made between two or more independent nations with a view to the public welfare" (2 Law Dic., 1136), and by Webster as "an agreement, league, or contract between two or more nations or sovereigns, formally signed by commissioners, properly authorized, and solemnly ratified by the sovereigns or the supreme power of each State."

In its essence it is a contract. It differs from an ordinary contract only in being an agreement between independent States instead of private parties. (Foster v. Neilson, 2 Pet., 253, 314; Head Money Cases, 112 U. S., 580.) By the Constitution (Art. II, sec. 2), the President "shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur." Obviously the treaty must contain the whole contract between the parties, and the power of the Senate is limited to a ratification of such terms as have already been agreed upon between the President, acting for the United States, and the commissioners of the other contracting power. The Senate has no right to ratify the treaty and introduce new terms into it, which shall be obligatory upon the other power, although it may refuse its ratification, or make such ratification conditional upon the adoption of amendments to the treaty. If, for instance, the treaty with Spain had contained a provision instating the inhabitants of the Philippines as citizens of the United States, the Senate might have refused to ratify it until this provision was stricken out. But it could not, in my opinion, ratify the treaty and then adopt a resolution declaring it not to be its intention to admit the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands to the privileges of citizenship of the United States. Such a resolution would be inoperative as an amendment to the treaty, since it had not received the assent of the President or the Spanish commissioners.

While this is the well-settled rule respecting amendments to treaties, it is also equally well settled that in case of ambiguity or doubt in the application of the terms of a treaty reference is frequently made to the contemporary declarations of the negotiators who framed the treaty and to prior negotiations, not to make a treaty where the parties have failed to do so, nor to change the terms of the treaty actually made, but to determine the general object of the negotiations, the particular sense in which the terms, otherwise uncertain of application, were used at the time, or the conditions as they existed at the time of the conclusion of the treaty. (Crandall on Treaties, Their Making, etc., sec. 166.)

The author there reviews a number of instances of the application of this rule, among others the case of United States v. Texas (163 U. S., 1, 23, 37), where the Supreme Court of the United States referred to the diplomatic correspondence that led to the treaty with Spain of February 22, 1819, "to show the circumstances under which the treaty of 1819 was made and to bring out distinctly two facts"—(1) that the negotiators had access to the map of Melish, improved to 1818, and published at Philadelphia (expressly referred to in the treaty), and (2) that the river referred to in the correspondence as Red River was believed by the negotiators to have had its source near Santa Fe and the Snow Mountains.

Again, in the Alaskan boundary tribunal Lord Chief Justice Alverstone, writing an opinion in support of the decision of a majority of the members of the tribunal for the purpose of giving construction to the meaning of the words employed in the treaty, referred to the meanings given to those words by the negotiators in their written communications during the course of the negotiations.

In the case of the proceedings before the mixed commission constituted under the Jay treaty with Great Britain to determine the St. Croix River and its sources as described in the treaty a letter written by Franklin was considered for the purpose of establishing a map used by the negotiators, as there appeared to be no river in the region under consideration known by the name used in the treaty.

So an explanatory note filed by the Russian minister as to the interpretation placed by his Government on the treaty of 1824 between the United States and Russia was at a later period used by the United States, who had succeeded Russia in all her rights to Alaska, in support of her contention in the Bering Sea controversy with Great Britain. (Crandall, p. 382.)

One of the most striking instances of the use of these contemporary memoranda is given by Crandall in the case of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain of April 19, 1850, where, after the adoption by the United States Senate of the resolution advising ratification, memoranda were filed by the negotiators in which it was stated that the language of article 1—that neither party would ever "occupy, or fortify, or colonize, or assume or exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America"—was not understood by the contracting States, nor by themselves, to include the British settlement at Honduras and adjacent islands.

Although the declaration of the American negotiator was given with the approval of the chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, who professed to speak as to the understanding of the Senate—an assumption denied and much criticized later by different Members—it formed no part of the treaty, not having been mutually agreed to by the treaty-making authorities of the two States. A main purpose of the treaty had been to do away with British pretensions in Central America, not to confirm them, and any exception to this general purpose and to the wording of the treaty should have been expressly stated. Whether Belize was or was not excepted from the operation of the treaty depended solely upon the geographical fact of its location without or within the boundaries of Central America as then known. But if this fact was not clearly ascertainable the memoranda, as expressions of those intimately connected with the formation of the article, could not be overlooked. (Crandall, p. 381.)

At the conclusion of the convention at the first international peace conference, held at The Hague on July 29, 1899 (2 Malloy, 2016–2032), the plenipotentiaries of the United States signed the convention for the pacific settlement of international disputes under reservation of the following declaration:

Nothing contained in this convention shall be so construed as to require the United States of America to depart from its traditional policy of not intruding upon, interfering with, or entangling itself in the political questions of policy or internal administration of any foreign State; nor shall anything contained in the said convention be construed to imply a relinquishment by the United States of America of its traditional attitude toward purely American questions.

It appears that the American delegates first declared this reservation on July 25, 1899, which was repeated when their signatures were placed on the convention as stated above. This action was reported to the President by the Secretary of State on December 19, 1899, when the conventions were forwarded without comment or recommendation to the President for submission to the Senate. This convention was duly ratified by the Government of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, on February 5, 1900, the resolution being incorporated in the act of ratification deposited at The Hague, but there is no record of any comment from other powers, although, of course, the other powers ratified the treaty or accepted it with the reservations placed upon it. The Senate resolution of ratification, however, did not include a declaration of the reservation above referred to, which was enunciated by the plenipotentiaries at the time of signing the convention and by the President in his proclamation dated November 1, 1901.

The reservation incorporated in the resolution of ratification by the Senate of the convention for the pacific settlement of international disputes concluded in the second international peace conference held at The Hague in 1907 is identical with the reservation to the convention declared by the United States delegates at the first international peace conference signed on July 29, 1899.

Again, in ratifying the convention and protocol signed April 2, 1906, after the Algeciras conference, which regulated in the interest of the powers commercial intercourse with northern Africa, the Senate resolved:

That the Senate, as a part of this act of ratification, understands that the participation of the United States in the Algeciras conference and in the formation and adoption of the general act and protocol which resulted therefrom was with the sole purpose of preserving and increasing its commerce in Morocco, the preservation of the life, liberty, or property of its citizens residing or traveling therein, and of aiding by its friendly offices and efforts in removing friction and controversy which seem to menace the peace between the powers signatory with the United States to the treaty of 1880 and without purpose to depart from the traditional American foreign policy which forbids participation by the United States in the settlement of political questions which are entirely European in their scope.

In February, 1913, the Senate ratified the international sanitary convention signed at Paris January 17, 1913, modifying the international sanitary convention of December 3, 1903, with the proviso:

That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of said convention with the understanding, to be expressed as a part of the instrument of ratification, that nothing contained in article 9 thereof shall be deemed to prevent the United States from carrying out any special quarantine measures against the infection of its ports which might be demanded by unusual sanitary conditions.

It does not appear that the treaty was referred back to the other powers for approval of this proviso, nor that such action was required, as there appears to be nothing in the ninth article which would prevent the United States from carrying out such special quarantine measures in the case referred to.

On the other hand, the Senate, in ratifying the proposed arbitration convention negotiated by Secretary KNOX under date of August 3, 1911, adopted as a part of the resolution of ratification a proviso—

That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of said treaty, with the understanding, to be made part of such ratification, that the treaty does not authorize the submission to arbitration of any question which affects the admission of aliens into the United States or the admission of aliens to the educational institutions of the several States, or the territorial integrity of the several States or of the United States, or concerning the question of the alleged indebtedness or moneyed obligations of any State of the United States, or any question which depends upon or involves the maintenance of the traditional attitude of the United States concerning American questions commonly described as the Monroe doctrine, or other purely governmental policy.

President Taft, considering this proviso to be at variance with the provisions of the treaty and as constituting in effect an amendment to it, withdrew the treaty from further consideration, and no further action was taken upon it.

It would seem, therefore, perfectly clear that a resolution of the Senate interpreting the treaty and clearly reserving American rights can be made without destroying the binding effect of the ratification.

Thus (1), respecting the Monroe doctrine, the covenant declares, in article 21:

Nothing in this covenant shall be deemed to affect the validity of international engagements, such as treaties of arbitration or regional understandings, like the Monroe doctrine, for securing the maintenance of peace.

The proponents of the league claim that by this language the Monroe doctrine is excepted from the jurisdiction of the council and the assembly of the league.

If this is true, there can be no harm and it would seem to be entirely proper for the Senate, in ratifying the treaty, to declare its interpretation of this clause in line with the precedents embodied in resolutions frequently adopted in the past, to the effect that the Senate should ratify the treaty with the understanding that it does not authorize—

The submission to arbitration or inquiry by the council of any question which depends upon or involves the maintenance of the traditional attitude of the United States concerning American questions commonly described as the Monroe doctrine.

That language has been used several times in similar reservations.

My own personal opinion is that the Monroe doctrine is not accurately described in the reservation in article 21, whether it be considered as an "international engagement" or a "regional understanding." I believe, however, it is sufficiently designated to be excepted from the jurisdiction of the league, but there are other Senators who disagree with me and who claim that it is neither an "international engagement" nor a "regional understanding," because no other country than this has by any treaty or specific declaration acknowledged the existence of our right to enforce such a doctrine. It is undoubtedly a purely American doctrine, created to protect this country. It was proclaimed by President Monroe and has been reaffirmed by other Presidents for the purpose of preventing foreign countries from obtaining a foothold upon the Western Hemisphere.

I believe the American people wish to make it perfectly clear that no foreign country shall be permitted to obtain colonies or to obtain naval or military bases beyond those now existing within the jurisdiction of these self-governing countries, especially those lying near our border. We do not intend that Japan shall obtain a military base in Mexico or anywhere near the Panama Canal, and it seems perfectly reasonable in the interest of a proper and amicable understanding with other countries that this should be declared.

(2) As to the provision in article 15, which reads:

If the dispute between the parties is claimed by one of them and is found by the council to arise out of a matter which by international law is solely within the domestic jurisdiction of that party, the council shall so report and shall make no recommendation as to its settlement.

This would seem to confer upon the council jurisdiction to determine whether a particular question which may arise is or is not by international law solely within the jurisdiction of a party to a dispute, and that the jurisdiction to decide that question, in effect, submits to the determination of the council all matters of domestic concern, and the council might hold as subject to its jurisdiction something which the United States always has maintained to be exclusively within its own competence; as, for example, questions relating to immigration, coastwise traffic, tariff, and other matters.

It would seem, therefore, not only proper, but the duty of the Senate, in ratifying a treaty, to declare its understanding that these questions are solely within the jurisdiction of the United States.

It is not possible that this, or any other country, will permit a league of nations to interfere with its internal governmental questions. We have our political, economic, and social policies and our national interests, different from many of the foreign countries. We must solve our problems in the interest of the American people, with justice to the rights of other nations. But they are essentially the problems of this people and can only be solved as American questions. The principal advocates of this league claim that the league has no jurisdiction over such questions. I do not think this claim is well founded, and I believe the provision should be made perfectly clear instead of leaving it in this ambiguous language, for, if that is the true meaning, there can not be the slightest objection to a declaration to that effect by the Senate.

(3) Respecting article 10, by which the "members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league," the question is somewhat different. I am not in favor of striking this article out of the league entirely. If this course should be pursued it would not be a part of the treaty as between other nations.

If, on the other hand, it is permitted to remain, and the Senate makes certain reservations in the resolution of ratification, the obligation of the other powers as to article 10 remains the same if they so elect.

There are some grave objections to this guaranty as it stands. Until this war it has been the traditional policy for the United States to avoid the conflicts among the nations of Europe. We are undoubtedly interested in preventing Germany from again becoming a world menace and in maintaining the stability of certain nations which have been formed through the results of this war. But to perpetually guarantee the territorial integrity and existing political independence of every nation in the world in distant continents is quite another proposition. I do not believe the people of this country desire that we should be required to send an army to Europe whenever the council of the league of nations so decrees.

What would be the attitude of the people of the United States if after this treaty becomes operative the council of the league should call upon us to send an army to protect Japan's Province of Shantung, or if Japan should do the same? I do not say that it was not necessary, in the interests of the larger objects to be attained by the President, to enter into that clause of the treaty, but I do say that it has shocked the moral sense of the American people. I do not contend that the treaty should be rejected on that account, but I do believe that it is not according to the declaration of the principles made by the President as the basis of the negotiations of a treaty of peace. I do not believe it possible that the American people, acting through its Congress, would ever marshal its forces to protect Japan's sovereignty over Shantung. It seems to me that if the time comes when this Nation, in the interest of world peace and the preservation of its Government and its own institutions, must call its sons to foreign soil, it never can and never will be done unless it receives the moral sanction of the American people, whatever the treaty obligations may be. In my opinion there ought not to be a promise which would require us to send an army to foreign shores which would be violated if the Congress, in the exercise of a constitutional right, should refuse to act.

Furthermore, it is well settled that while the treaty-making power can obligate the United States to the payment of sums of money, it can not itself appropriate from the United States Treasury the amounts specified or compel the Congress to provide for their payment. And Congress alone can declare war and eventually carry out this guaranty, if such action should become necessary to protect any foreign country. Undoubtedly, nations dealing with the treaty-making power are presumed to have knowledge of this limitation. (See 1 Willoughby on the Constitution, sec. 206; 2 Butler, Treaty-making Power, sec. 372, and cases cited.)

In the case of Turner v. American Baptist Missionary Union, Federal cases, No. 14251, Mr. Justice McLean, on the circuit, said:

A treaty under the Federal Constitution is declared to be the supreme law of the land. This, unquestionably, applies to all treaties where the treaty-making power, without the aid of Congress, can carry it into effect. It is not, however, and can not be the supreme law of the land where the concurrence of Congress is necessary to give it effect. Until this power is exercised, as where the appropriation of money is required, the treaty is not perfect. It is not operative in the sense of the Constitution, as money can not be appropriated by the treaty-making power. This results from the limitations of our Government. The action of no department of the Government can be regarded as a law until it shall have all the sanctions required by the Constitution to make it such.

Here, again, there is great divergence of opinion among Senators and the public generally as to the real meaning of article 10. Nearly every Senator who has spoken in favor of the league, and many public men of the highest ability claim that the suggestions of the council of the league in carrying out the undertaking in article 10, are merely advisory and that each country is at liberty to determine for itself the extent of its obligation, and whether it will invoke its military power to enforce this article in case of aggression.

The President, in his last message to the Senate, referring to article 10, said:

> The covenant of the league of nations provides for military action for the protection of its members only upon advice of the council of the league—advice given, it is to be presumed, only upon deliberation and acted upon by each of the governments of the member States only if its own judgment justifies such action.

Now, is it entirely clear under article 10 that the United States may not be called on to use its military and naval forces except upon the advice of the council of the league? The first part of article 10 seems to be a promise to resort to any action necessary to protect the territorial integrity of any member of the league. But if the construction placed upon it by the proponents of the league is correct, to-wit, that we can only be called on to protect the territorial integrity and political independence of any member of the league against external aggression upon advice of the council, certainly it is the duty of the Senate at least to place that same construction upon it in its resolution of ratification.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], who led in the debate for the treaty after it was laid before the Senate, expressed the same opinion, as follows:

> The unanimous recommendation of the council is only advisory, and must be approved by the Governments of the several members of the league. This insures that the burden under this article will be fairly and properly distributed. While each member of the league makes a solemn pledge of mutual protection, yet each reserves its right of judgment as to duty and obligation in each case as it arises, and the means by which it shall be discharged. Thus, under article 10, no troops of the United States could be sent to engage in war without the advice of her representatives in the council and the approval of her Congress. This insures us against undue burdens and impositions. It leaves the extent of our moral and political obligations to our own sense of honor, and we ourselves measure the just demands upon our plighted promise.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] on June 25, in a colloquy between the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and himself, referring to this clause of the covenant, stated as follows:

> The purpose of this clause is obviously to secure concert of action, but it is left to each nation to determine for itself, the recommendation of the council notwithstanding, whether the occasion calls for action in fulfillment of its obligation and how that obligation ought to be discharged.

Again, speaking upon this same subject on July 28, the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], as I understand him, reiterated that position, indorsed the position taken by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], and stated as his final conclusion as follows:

> Mr. KELLOGG. But I understand the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] claims that not only are the recommendations of the council merely advisory, but as to the extent of our obligation it is for the Congress of the United States to determine the justness of the demand.
> Mr. WALSH. I agree with that.

This is the position taken by Mr. Oscar S. Straus, one of the leading advocates of the plan for a league of nations, who was in Paris during the negotiations for the covenant. Considering article 16 in connection with article 10, in a statement published in the Evening Star on June 30, he made the following observations:

> Article 10 does not compel us to go any further than this, provided Congress determines, as it has a full right to do, that such a boycott, if imposed and continued, will prevent threatened or put an end to external aggression, for the article provides that in case of such aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.
> EACH LEAGUE MEMBER FREE.
> In other words, the council is not permitted to prescribe, to determine, to order, or direct what means shall be employed in order to fulfill the obligation, but only "shall advise." That is to say, in the final analysis each nation member of the league is free to follow that advice or adopt such other means, as provided for in article 16, which in its judgment will be adequate to accomplish this result.
> The word "advise" in this article is used in the same sense as the word "recommend" is used in the second clause of article 16, which provides: "It shall be the duty of the council in such case to recommend to the several governments concerned what effective military or naval forces the members of the league shall severally contribute to the armaments of forces to be used to protect the covenants of the league." In other words, the council does not prescribe, order, or direct, but its duty is to "recommend."

In fact, I do not recall among the advocates of the league anyone who claims to the contrary. But there are men of equal ability in the Senate and elsewhere who claim that this constitutes an absolute guaranty not only to respect but to preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of every member of the league wherever situated, and if deemed necessary by the council the United States will be compelled to contribute military and naval forces and provide any other reasonable means that will be effective in fulfilling the obligation of the United States under such a guaranty.

In my opinion the first part of article 10 constitutes such an unqualified undertaking, and while, of course, the Congress alone can declare war, there is the promise of the United States, made pursuant to the lawful treaty-making power, to undertake such protection by military force, or otherwise, for all members of the league.

I believe, therefore, that there should be some reservations construing this clause in such a way that it shall be absolutely clear and certain that the function of the council is simply to serve in an advisory capacity, so that the other signatory powers will thoroughly understand that the Congress of the United States has the sole and exclusive power to declare war and provide for the operation of the military and naval forces of the United States, and that the failure of the Congress to contribute to the relief of any member of the league shall not be deemed a violation of the covenant; or, as the President says, that it shall be left to the judgment of each member whether the circumstances justify such action. Otherwise it will be impossible to determine the construction that the council may place upon this clause.

I can not understand why, if this is the proper interpretation, as claimed by proponents of the league, the Senate, in the exercise of its prerogative, should not so declare. The individual expressions of opinion by Senators, or even the President, do not control it. The expression of the collective judgment of the Senate by its vote does control it. Shall we leave to the uncertain arbitrament of contending nations in future years the question whether the United States shall marshal its armies upon foreign soil or be branded as a violator of treaties, or shall the world rely, as it must, upon the good faith of the American people which has been abiding for the protection of this country as well as that of our allies in this war? If we subscribe to this covenant for a league of nations, it is incumbent upon us to be scrupulous in the observance of all its provisions.

There is another reason why this should be done by a reservation rather than an amendment. There are many parties to this treaty. If the Senate strikes out article 10 entirely, its elimination must be accepted by all the signatory powers, and article 10 will no longer constitute a part of the treaty between them. The United States can have no objection to the European nations guaranteeing the territorial integrity and existing political independence of any of the members of the league. We, on the other hand, are situated differently. We are not in the immediate vicinity of those governments lately set up as independent. We are not so intimately interested in their stability as is France, England, Italy, and other European nations. We have a more direct interest in the stability of the nations of the Western Continent. We might, therefore, by a reservation limit the obligation of the United States without affecting the treaty between the other nations who are willing to accept article 10 without reservation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves that subject, will he discuss the power of the council, taking into account the fact that the council can render no decision and give no advice without the consent of the American representative on the council?

Mr. KELLOGG. That is true, if the United States will be required to act only upon the advice of the council of the league. But if there is a definite obligation under the first part of article 10 it is not dependent upon the advice of the council. It is the call of a foreign country upon the United States to employ military and naval forces without the free exercise of the judgment of the Congress, which I wish to prevent.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is not the language of article 10 very specific—not that the foreign country can call, but only that the council can call by way of advice? There is no provision at all that any country can call upon us. It is only the council, and we constitute one-ninth of the council; and the council can not act without the consent of the American representative.

Mr. KELLOGG. Of course I have very great respect for the Senator's opinion and for the opinion of other Senators who believe that; but the language of the article is:

> The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league.

There it concludes with a period. A direct obligation and undertaking are imposed upon this country. It is followed, to be sure, with this clause:

In case of any such aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

The obligation of the United States to protect the territorial integrity of any country does not seem to be dependent upon a call from the council of the league; and if that is true it would make no difference what the position of our representatives upon the council was. If Japan called upon us to protect her Shantung Province, or if some other member in the Far East called upon us to protect her territorial integrity or to expel some neighbor who had trespassed upon it, I wish the judgment of the American people, to be expressed by the Congress of the United States, as to whether the cause is just and whether the obligation of this nation compels us to respond.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am very much surprised that the Senator should insert something into the league which is not there at all. I think there is not a word in the constitution of the league anywhere which justifies any nation in calling upon any other for protection. On the other hand, specific provision is made that the advice must come from the council of nine nations, which must be unanimous, and we constitute one of the nine.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. KELLOGG. I know that is the opinion of many Senators, men of great ability, but it is also the opinion of many others that there is an absolute promise. If the construction of the Senator is correct, then why not so state in our resolution of ratification? I am not contending that the construction I have suggested is correct. I am announcing it for the judgment of the Senate.

I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, in his answer to the inquiry of the Senator from Nebraska, the Senator from Minnesota has pretty nearly covered what I wanted to suggest to him. There can be no question under the language of article 10, which the Senator has just read, that the United States, if it shall enter this league, undertakes to preserve and protect the territorial integrity of members of the league. "Undertake" means that we contract to do it. It is a sacred contract, the highest and most solemn promise that a nation can make, and it is a promise in behalf of the Nation. The fact that article 10 in another place proceeds to state that the council may advise as to the manner in which that contract shall be performed does not derogate from our obligation to fulfill the contract, and whether we are called upon by any nation or by the league to fulfill our contract is immaterial. We contract to preserve the territorial integrity of the members of the league, and all the council has to do about it is to suggest the manner in which that contract shall be performed. But our obligation to preserve the territorial integrity of all the members of the league remains unimpaired and unimpeachable.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I make my statement as to the meaning of this section in no dogmatic spirit. I may be wrong, but there are many men who indulge the same views.

It is my opinion, therefore, that if we ratify the treaty, defining the obligation of the United States under article 10, it will not interfere in any way with the other nations ratifying the treaty and obligating their respective governments to any extent they see fit. Such a reservation would simply modify our obligation under article 10.

This course was pursued when the Senate ratified The Hague convention, the Algeciras conference, and the international sanitary convention of 1913. As the instrument now stands, I am inclined to the opinion that there is an absolute promise to preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of the members of the league, and that it would constitute a breach of the treaty if the council should call upon this country and the Congress refuse to employ all usual means to enforce such provision, although foreign countries must be presumed to know the limitations of our Constitution.

Article 1 provides that any member of the league may, after two years' notice of intention so to do, withdraw from the league, provided that all its international obligations and all its obligations under this covenant shall have been fulfilled at the time of withdrawal.

Senator Root suggested an amendment, which, in substance, provides that no claim, charge, or finding that international obligation or obligations under the covenant have not been fulfilled will be deemed to render the two years' notice ineffectual, or to keep the power giving the notice in the league after the expiration of the time specified in the notice.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] claims that is the proper construction of this section as it now stands. He says:

Disputes arising prior to the withdrawal must be settled as provided in the covenant. This the United States, if she becomes a member, agrees to. But under no provision in this covenant would the United States undertake to let the council, assembly, or any body or person determine whether she had discharged her obligations and to permit her to withdraw from the league. Hence she reserves this decision for herself. The decision of this question, as it affects her, would be left to the judgment and conscience of her own Government, free from any agreement to submit its decision elsewhere.

Of course, if the Senator from Virginia is correct, the reservation which was proposed by Senator Root would be necessary. But is this the proper construction to be placed upon this article? It seems to make the right of any country to withdraw, after two years' notice, provisional upon all its international and other obligations, under the covenant, having been fulfilled at the time of withdrawal. It does not empower the league to prevent a country from withdrawing, but it makes its very right to withdraw depend upon such compliance. Whether there exists any power to prevent a member from withdrawing is not the only question which should interest us. We ought to be scrupulous in carrying out our obligations, and it is entirely within the range of probabilities that nations might disagree as to whether we had fulfilled our obligations.

I have made these suggestions as others have made them, in varying forms, for the purpose of accomplishing something practicable toward ratifying the treaty. If the construction placed upon these various provisions by the principal proponents of the league are correct, the reservations I have proposed will constitute nothing more than declarations of construction, which would be binding upon all the other powers. If they are wrong in their constructions, such declarations would constitute reservations and would change the substance of the provisions. But since no one can tell what construction the council or the assembly may place upon these articles, we should make a binding declaration to form a part of the ratification of the covenant. I can not believe it possible that any other power will object to these reservations. Certainly no nation would for a moment permit the council of the league of nations to pass upon its domestic and political questions.

I am anxious that this treaty should be ratified at the earliest possible date, the war ended, our soldiers returned home, and the country permitted to return to normal peace conditions. I do not expect that the league of nations will permanently prevent war or that it will be a complete panacea for all the evils which threaten the peace of the world. I realize that it is to some extent an experiment, but it is an experiment I am willing to try. This country has for a quarter of a century been the leader in establishing the principles of arbitration, international understanding, and pacific settlement of disputes. All of the Secretaries of State since the administration of William McKinley have been leaders in this great world movement. We should not now take a backward step. I know there is much to be criticized in this covenant for a league as well as in the treaty. It is obscure in many of its provisions and difficult of interpretation. The obligations imposed and the jurisdiction conferred are in many respects vague and ill defined.

Men of the highest talent and experience in international law disagree radically as to the meaning of some of its provisions, as we see by the discussion of the principal points which I have mentioned. By some it seems to be claimed that our representatives in Paris were wiser than the Senate, and that it is a reflection upon them if any change whatever is made, even to clarifying the language.

If this is correct, then the Senate has no function to perform in this the most important treaty ever submitted to a deliberative body. Is it to be supposed that the Senate knows less of the proper obligations to impose upon this country than our commissioners, or is less qualified to define with accuracy these obligations and to determine the duties to be performed under the treaty? I have no patience with the sentiment so often here expressed that the Senate should entirely abrogate its functions.

The statements I have made are uttered in a nonpartisan and impersonal spirit. From the beginning of the discussion relating to this subject I have expressed myself to the effect that I earnestly and heartily hoped and desired that a coalition might be formed among the nations of the world which would serve to forestall war and promote peace.

The exceptions to the covenant which I have stated are not in any manner designed to defeat the present plan for a league of nations, nor to induce the opinion that I am opposed to this covenant. I am only zealous that the traditions, rights, and privileges which the United States has maintained, exercised, and enjoyed shall not be destroyed or restricted. I firmly believe that if the exceptions that have been stated are concurred in and adopted, it will in no way detract from the influence which the United States will exercise in connection with the functions of the league, and will render this Nation an even greater factor in world affairs.

I also appreciate the aversion which exists for European entanglements and alliances, which should, however, be overcome by the realization that no more disastrous results can ensue from a league of nations than have been wrought by the great conflict which has just closed during which we have been compelled to ally ourselves with the nations of Europe.

The future, as it develops, will coordinate more and more the activities and interests of nations, and there is every reason to believe that, in the nature of things, an international court or league must sooner or later be established to advise upon and regulate the sum of human affairs and interests.

APPENDIX.

DRAFT OF THE RESERVATIONS.

That the Senate of the United States advise and consent to the ratification of said treaty with the following reservations and understandings, to be made a part of the treaty by the instrument of ratification:

1. That whenever the two years' notice of withdrawal from the league of nations shall have been given by the United States, as provided in article 1, the United States shall be the sole judge whether all its international obligations and all its obligations under this covenant shall have been fulfilled at the time of withdrawal.

2. That the suggestions of the council of the league of nations as to the means of carrying the obligations of article 10 into effect are only advisory, and that any undertaking under the provisions of article 10 the execution of which may require the use of American military or naval forces or economic measures can under the Constitution be carried out only by the action of the Congress, and that the failure of the Congress to adopt the suggestions of the council of the league, or to provide such military or naval forces or economic measures, shall not constitute a violation of the treaty.

RESERVES DOMESTIC QUESTIONS.

3. The United States reserves to itself the right to decide what questions are within its domestic jurisdiction and declares that all domestic and political questions relating to its internal affairs, including immigration, coastwise traffic, the tariff, commerce, and all other purely domestic questions are solely within the jurisdiction of the United States and are not by this covenant submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the council or the assembly of the league of nations or to the decision or recommendation of any other power.

4. The United States does not bind itself to submit for arbitration or inquiry by the assembly or the council any question which in the judgment of the United States depends upon or involves its long-established policy commonly known as the Monroe doctrine, and it is preserved unaffected by any provision in the said treaty contained.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator, as I understand, has finished his remarks.

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes; I have concluded.

Mr. PITTMAN. Then I would like to ask the Senator a question. The Senator has called attention to the resolution by the Russian Government made subsequent to our treaty with Russia in 1824, and has stated that that resolution was subsequently used in construing the treaty. I agree with the Senator as to that. I ask the Senator if he would be satisfied with a similar resolution embracing the interpretations that he has filed?

Mr. KELLOGG. No, Mr. President. My recollection is that that was merely referred to in order to determine what the language meant. I would not be satisfied with a resolution adopted after the treaty was ratified, because, unless it was a part of the ratification, it would not be binding upon us and the other countries if the construction of the Senator from Nevada is wrong.

Mr. PITTMAN. Let us see if we understand each other. If it was not a part of the resolution of ratification it would not be a part of the contract. Is not that true?

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly. It would undoubtedly be considered by any court of arbitration which might in future years be passing upon the question as having some effect as to the meaning of doubtful language. Undoubtedly it would express the sentiment of the Senate. But if it is incorporated in the resolution of ratification, if the language of the article is not what the Senator from Nevada claims it is, it does change the instrument as to us.

Mr. PITTMAN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. KELLOGG. If it is as the Senator claims it is, it does not.

Mr. PITTMAN. Undoubtedly; but what I am getting at is that it becomes a part of the contract.

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly.

Mr. PITTMAN. And in construing the contract as affecting us it takes the place of any other language bearing on the same subject that may be in conflict with it.

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes; it does in substance, and it should.

Mr. PITTMAN. Take, for instance, the clause which the Senator submitted with regard to domestic matters, exempting domestic questions from the effect of the treaty. The treaty provides that the question as to whether or not it is a domestic question shall be determined by the council. The Senator's reservation, which would become a part of the contract if it should be adopted by us so far as affecting us, provides that it is to be determined not by the council but by us. Is not that a change in the contract?

Mr. KELLOGG. If the treaty is as the Senator says, that the council is to decide what are domestic and what are not domestic questions, the council may decide that all our questions are international questions and we are deprived of all jurisdiction. This reservation would change it, and ought to change it, because I believe the American people will never consent—and, indeed, no self-respecting nation will ever consent—to have those questions submitted to the arbitration or determination of any foreign country.

Mr. PITTMAN. I am not arguing with regard to the merits of the reservation, because the merits are apparent to everyone. I am dealing with the effect of the Senator's statement. The Senator stated that certain reservations added to the treaty would not necessitate a further consent by the other parties to the treaty.

What I am getting at is this: If the language added to the treaty by the Senator is language that does become binding and that language may change the situation as it now exists, it may change the contract. I do not think the Senator feels that he could get the benefit of his reservations with regard to the exemption of our domestic relations unless the other countries agreed that that language should be the language that would bind it as between us and that country.

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly; if the reservation I propose as to domestic questions changes the substance of the contract, it must be accepted by the other parties either by ratification, exchange of notes, or in some other manner. I wish to say further that if the construction placed upon that section is as the Senator indicates I shall insist upon this reservation.

Mr. PITTMAN. There is just one other question I should like to ask the Senator. The other day I thought the Senator was in perfect harmony with me—and I believe he is now—and the only reason why I am interrupting him now is because I have such high regard for his opinion. I called attention to the fact that there was a distinction between resolutions which were concurrent, you might say, or practically simultaneous with the ratification of the treaty, and reservations contained in the resolution of ratification. I wanted that distinction clearly made, because at the present time I am absolutely in favor of the substance of every reservation that the Senator has put forward, as I remember them. However, I think it is important to determine what the effect would be if included in a separate resolution and the effect if included in the resolution of ratification. I am satisfied in my own mind that if included in a separate resolution they serve to give notice to those with whom we are dealing of the position we will take if the construction of the treaty comes in question. I think the Senator agrees with me on that.

Mr. KELLOGG. I think it would, of course.

Mr. PITTMAN. I am satisfied also that the powers who might be construing the treaty, at the time the question arose, would take into consideration that resolution, but they would only take it into consideration as interpreting the language already in the treaty. The only way that you can prevent courts or boards of arbitration from taking into consideration the language of the treaty is by substituting other language in the treaty, and that is done by reservations in the resolution of ratification. If you substitute other language in the body of a contract it is not binding on the other side, and I do not think the Senator will deny this, until the change is consented to, whether it be deemed material or immaterial. Of course, the consent may be evidenced in many different ways. I do not mean necessarily by an affirmative consent; I mean consent in law—an agreement to the change.

A concurrent or simultaneous resolution, such as Russia adopted in 1824, is not submitted as a part of the treaty and does not call for consent of either party to treaty.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. KELLOGG. I will say to the Senator, and then I will yield to the Senator from Massachusetts, that a resolution passed after the treaty has been ratified would, of course, serve notice upon them of our position. It might be considered, and probably would, by any tribunal having jurisdiction, as indicating our objection to, or rather our interpretation of, the language which should be contained in a resolution of ratification, because if the language is as some Senators claim, it should be properly and effectively construed. On the other hand, if it is as the Senator from Nevada and other Senators claim, it would be a binding declaration of its meaning, and other countries could not ignore it whenever they came to consider the question.

I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. PITTMAN. I beg the Senator's pardon, I have the floor.

Mr. LODGE. I believe the Senator from Minnesota merely yielded for the purpose of permitting the Senator from Nevada to ask a question.

Mr. PITTMAN. I rose for the purpose of asking questions, and if the Senator from Minnesota does not desire to answer them——

Mr. KELLOGG. Let the Senator proceed and ask his question, then. I am perfectly willing to answer, if I can.

Mr. PITTMAN. I would not have asked any questions of the Senator if I had thought they annoyed him or that he desired not to hear them. I simply want to state that, while I am heartily in favor of the substance of the resolution of the Senator, as I remember it, the question I have in my mind, and the question that the Senator from Minnesota must have in his mind, as he is desirous of an early ratification of the treaty, is the effect it is going to have on the passage of the treaty, and that depends on the effect of making it a part of the resolution of ratification. The Senator agrees now—at least I so interpret his remarks—that his reservations become a part of the treaty if they are included in the ratification. I do not think, as a lawyer, he will deny that you can add nothing to the language of the treaty that will subsequently be construed as a part of the treaty unless the addition is agreed to by the other party to be bound by it. That is the view I take of it, and the only question I have in my mind is simply whether or not the danger of defeating this whole treaty by adding reservations and reopening negotiations is greater than the danger of accepting the treaty, with its ambiguities, as it is. When I have determined that question finally in my mind, I will know whether I am going to vote for the Senator's reservations as part of the ratification. I have said before that, with the view I hold, I think the reservations of the Senator, if made a part of this treaty, would not only have to go back to 22 countries, but they would have to go back to Germany with the treaty for further consideration and action. I do not only think they would have to go back, but I can not conceive that such an explicit reservation on behalf of the United States as its right to determine any question as to whether it affected its domestic or internal life would not be instantly demanded by every other country. I think they would demand it.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am willing to answer any question. I take it the Senator has completed his question. I did not yield for the purpose of an argument.

Mr. PITTMAN. No; I was not asking the Senator any more questions, because I assumed that he objected.

Mr. KELLOGG. I think I have explained the meaning of the reservations. I can not imagine that any foreign country for a moment will consent that their domestic questions shall be submitted to the council of the league of nations. The questions that we are reserving are of such importance to the American people that I believe it is the bounden duty of the Senate to incorporate these reservations in the resolution of ratification.

Mr. PITTMAN. I thoroughly agree with the Senator from Minnesota that no country will ever surrender its domestic jurisdiction. Every country is just as interested as our country in the matter, and I further state to the Senator from Minnesota——

Mr. KELLOGG. I have answered the Senator's question, and I still have the floor. If the Senator wishes to ask any further question without making a speech I shall be glad to answer him.

Mr. PITTMAN. I should like to have the ruling of the Chair as to who has the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McNARY in the chair). The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] has the floor. He yielded to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] for a question.

Mr. PITTMAN. I asked the Senator if he had concluded his speech, and then desired to know whether he would answer a question.

Mr. KELLOGG. I had not yielded the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognized the Senator from Minnesota as having the floor, and the Senator from Nevada requested permission to propound a question.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not desire to annoy the Senator from Minnesota with any more questions. He is evidently very desirous of yielding the floor to some one else.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I only want to ask the Senator from Minnesota if it is not true that under the general practice as distinguishing a reservation from an amendment, the amendment being a change of the text has of course to receive the assent of every signatory, but a reservation under the usual practice does not? If the other parties to the treaty make no objection, the reservation stands as accepted. Does not the Senator understand that to be the practice?

Mr. KELLOGG. That has been the practice. We have some treaties in which we have made reservations. There is no record anywhere of any affirmative action of any foreign country except by putting the treaty into operation.

Mr. LODGE. That is the general practice.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I think I have the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, undoubtedly; but I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. LODGE. I have not occupied the floor a great deal in this debate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Neither have I.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to say a few words more.

I hope when we put these reservations on we shall provide that they shall be accepted by at least the other four of the five principal allied and associated powers before we become members of the league, and that we shall have their acceptance of our reservations. There will be no question about it. They will accept them.

Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. BRANDEGEE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi for a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has just stated that if a reservation is made to the treaty it is binding upon every party to the treaty that does not protest against the reservation, and the Senator from Minnesota has just said that is his understanding of the uniform practice. Now, the Senator from Massachusetts says that if we make any reservations he shall insist upon the four or five principal nations agreeing to them. Why is it necessary to have them agree if it goes without saying unless they protest?

Mr. KELLOGG. I think the Senator should address his question to the Senator from Massachusetts. Undoubtedly if a foreign country should put the treaty into operation with a reservation, it would be accepted in the same manner as a contract put into force with a reservation upon it. Whether the Senator from Massachusetts thinks it is necessary, in addition to that, to have the four principal allied powers accept it I can not say. I judge he does not think it necessary, but that is for him to answer.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will ask the Senator from Minnesota one more question and then cease to bother him.

Mr. KELLOGG. You are not bothering me in the least.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator says it is like a contract which contains a reservation. If I sign a contract with the Senator and then make a reservation which I sign and which he does not sign, does that affect the written contract?

Mr. KELLOGG. If you sign a contract the language of a section of which is doubtful, and when you sign it you place an interpretation on it, and the other party takes the contract and puts it in force, he tacitly, of course, accepts your reservation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In a case where he does not sign it?

Mr. KELLOGG. Suppose he has already signed it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. He has already signed that part of it which preceded the reservation, but has not signed the reservation.

Mr. KELLOGG. If he puts the contract in force with a reservation as to the interpretation to be placed upon it, it is a valid contract.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course, if a man executes a contract with a reservation, even though made by an outsider, it is executed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I shall be very brief in what I have to say. As I understand the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], he would have a reservation which would prevent anybody claiming that under article 10 we were bound to send troops abroad. Of course, that would be wise, in my opinion, so far as it goes, but it would still leave us bound by a contract to preserve the territorial integrity of members of the league.

Mr. KELLOGG. Will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. KELLOGG. If Congress alone can make war, send the Army and Navy abroad, and control the economic policies of the country, will the Senator tell me how we could protect the territorial integrity of any nation without the consent of Congress?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think it would leave us—and that is exactly the point I make—in the position where we had covenanted in a treaty to preserve the territorial integrity of all members of the league, with a condition annexed that we should not be compelled to carry out that contract by the only effective means by which it could be carried out; and it would result in an absurdity, in my opinion.

Mr. KELLOGG. I wish to say to the Senator if he will permit me——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. KELLOGG. There is also an agreement that we shall respect the territorial integrity of foreign countries.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes, of course. I did not suppose we were going to attack them.

Mr. President, in my opinion, the only effective reservation to be made in reference to article 10 is a reservation by which we would decline to be bound by that article even if we entered the league of nations.

In reference to the remark of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], if I understood him, that after the treaty had been ratified the Senate could pass some sort of a declaratory or interpretative resolution as to our understanding of it, of course that, in my opinion, would be absolutely futile. Once the Senate has approved and ratified the treaty, and it has been ratified by the other signatories and ratifications have been exchanged, nothing that the Senate could say or do would have the slightest effect on it. The contract would then speak for itself.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I shall do so in just a moment.

If, however, at the time of the resolution of ratification the Senate says affirmatively "we will ratify this treaty with the reservation that we understand thus and so," then that does not become a part of the treaty; it does not alter the treaty; the treaty stands as it is between the nations which have accepted it; but it leaves us unbound by those things which we have reserved.

Now I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, what the Senator has just said raises the very point to which I desire to call his attention, for the reason that he is a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I also notice that several other members of that committee are present. The Senator says if in ratifying the treaty we adopt certain reservations, that then we are not bound except subject to those reservations. I sincerely hope that the Senator from Connecticut and the other members of the Committee on Foreign Relations will give the most earnest consideration and investigation to that proposition before it is acted upon.

I am very strongly inclined to agree with the suggestion made a few moments ago by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], that if we sign a written agreement, a contract between nations—which in its interpretation and effect is subject to the same laws as is a contract between individuals—any extraneous statement that we may make after we have signed it or while we are signing it that we put such and such construction on it or that we are not bound except to such and such an extent will be perfectly futile and without any effect whatever. The only effect that it could possibly have would be the effect that the other parties to the contract would choose to give it.

Of course, as the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] has said, if a man attaches certain reservations or conditions to his contract, and the other party to the contract, although not signing them, gives effect to them, then they become a part of the agreement. Then the contract becomes, as the Senator from Mississippi very truly stated, an executed contract, and being put into effect would be valid if there were no writing at all. That is the situation into which we are very apt to fall in this matter if mere reservations are relied upon to preserve our national rights.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. I think I agree with the position just taken by the Senator from Washington, that if a contract is sent to me to sign which has been signed by another party, and I sign it, but I accompany it with what I consider to be an interpretation or construction of the contract, it does not bind the other party at all. The courts are full of decisions which utterly disregard any such proposition.

I can say further to the Senator that no such interpretation will be put through in the Senate unless the Democrats put it through.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then it will not be put through.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I do not think that there is a close analogy between an ordinary contract at law and a treaty of peace between nations, at least in this respect. As I am informed—for I have had no large experience in such matters—in the ratification of treaties and in the understanding of nations in that respect, where the Senate in the resolution of ratification, which is to all intents and purposes the signing of the contract—for the affixing of the signatures of the plenipotentiaries is merely an administrative act—as a part of its approval inserts a condition which is a reservation, such reservation by universal custom has been considered by the other parties to the treaty as binding upon them; and it has not always been considered, and I doubt if it has ever been considered, absolutely necessary that such other parties should affirmatively assent to such reservation by a positive act; silence has been considered as giving consent. The exchange of ratifications, the deposit of the resolutions of ratification adopted by the Senate in the depository, the place designated in the treaty for the deposit of the resolutions of ratification, and the acceptance of them have been considered an assent by the other signatories to the treaty.

However that may be, I thoroughly agree with the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], what I consider to be the view of the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], and the statement of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] that this matter is of such overwhelming and far-reaching importance that if the Senate adds any reservations to this treaty I think the resolution of ratification itself should provide that we shall not be considered as ratifying the treaty unless and until the other signatories, or at least the four or five principal signatories, shall have affirmatively assented to our reservations, because I want to put the nails in and clinch them on the other side.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. Suppose we assert in the form of a reservation at the time we ratify the treaty that "we ratify it with certain reservations reading so-and-so," which may in effect modify the treaty as it now stands, and the other parties to the treaty, saying nothing in regard to such reservations, go ahead and appoint the 30 or 40 commissions which are provided for in the treaty itself, have they not by acquiescence practically ratified the treaty with our amendments, and would they not be bound by them without any further affirmative action upon their part? The very fact that they make no objection and the fact that they show their acquiescence by appointing their committees and acting upon it in accordance with its terms as it stands after our modifications would show their attitude in the matter.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if I understand the Senator, he raises the same question over again that we have been discussing. I repeat that my understanding of the matter is that it has always been considered where the Senate puts reservations in the resolution of ratification and the other signatories are silent then the reservations are binding upon them; unless they protest, they agree. If ratifications are exchanged and ours containing reservations are deposited and the other signatories read them and make no objection, they are assumed to have consented to them.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Just a moment. I do not think that the mere fact that they go ahead and appoint 30 or 40 commissions under the treaty which they have already signed and which is certainly good between them and whether or not we ratify the treaty at all would have any effect on the subject. I now yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, when we agree to this treaty with certain reservations it amounts to a statement that we agree to the treaty except in the particulars reserved. If, then, the other parties to the treaty remain silent, especially if they go ahead and act under the treaty, the principle of equitable estoppal that applies between man and man in the case of contracts would apply in this case. Of that there is no doubt; and in that case there will be absolutely no necessity for providing that they shall indicate a formal acceptance. If they remain silent and go ahead and operate under it, that amounts to an acceptance.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I agree with the Senator, and I have twice so stated; but there seems to be some doubt or some confusion in the minds of some Senators as to whether our reservations could be effective. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has suggested that one can not sign a contract and then affix to it a condition modifying the contract after the other party has signed it. I do not think that is a correct analogy; but, in order to avoid any doubt or chance for future dispute, if, in the wisdom of the Senate, they shall put reservations into the resolution of ratification, and if by keeping still the other parties agree to them, if they are going to agree to them, it is no privation upon them to say that they will agree to them; that is all, I say. It makes assurance doubly sure; that is all.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield further to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to call attention to another distinction. This is not the case of the altering of a written contract after it is fully executed. So far as we are concerned, the contract is not executed until we ratify it; and in the act of ratification we have a right to make what exceptions we see fit. It is not like the case of an exception to a contract which has already been entered into fully on both sides.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I agree with the Senator as forcefully and emphatically as he has agreed with himself.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. In order that there may not be any unnecessary waste of time in the discussion of interpretations or amendments which are going to be based upon the silence of some other nation, I desire to say that if any such thing passes through the Senate the votes will have to be furnished by those who are in favor of this league. We, to a certain number, are not going to consent to any amendment or reservation which rests for its vitality upon the mere silence of another power.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I thoroughly agree with the Senator, as far as my intention and effort are concerned. I will join with him for that purpose and effect.

Mr. President, I do not want to weary the Senate or engage in any work of supererogation; but I do want to make a statement, because I think there is some confusion in the minds of some Senators, at least, if I correctly interpret their remarks.

It is continually suggested on this floor by the friends of the league of nations that there is undue delay on the part of the Senate in this connection, and they generally talk about the treaty. There is very little opposition to the treaty except in one or two parts, barring the league of nations covenant. Everybody is going to ratify a peace treaty with Germany, of course. The only thing that is preventing the immediate ratification of the peace treaty with Germany is that they insist on putting in an entirely irrelevant thing—this barnacle, this league of hallucinations, which is retarding peace. It is the continued insistence by these obsessed rainbow chasers upon their sacred ark of the covenant, which is a Pandora's box of troubles and a witch's cauldron of complications which nobody understands, which alone is delaying peace between us and Germany.

I want to suggest this: The League to Enforce Peace and the idolaters of the administration seem to insist that if we put on any reservations it is going to send the treaty back to all of the 42 nations and necessitate the resummoning of the peace conference. There is not a word of truth in that. No reservation that the Senate puts on will necessitate the resubmission of the treaty or the resummoning of the peace conference. The reservations are simply our declarations in the resolution of ratification. The treaty, if it is signed by Great Britain and France and Italy and Germany and Belgium, is a treaty between them, and we can not affect that. That is in existence as soon as they sign it. Whether we enter into it or not is a different proposition.

That treaty has been sent here. The treaty, if we sign it and if it is to be binding upon all these different nations, must be the same instrument. If we amend the treaty by striking out one of its articles or making any change in it, then it will have to be resubmitted to all these nations, and they will have to agree with us in that amendment, or else we will have to withdraw from it; and all of us must sign the same treaty. Not so with reservations. The Senate can make any reservations it has a mind to make in the resolution of ratification, and if the other powers do not object to them, in my opinion they will be binding, or if they agree to them they will be binding. That does not change the treaty. Our reservations do not change the treaty. They simply take us out from those provisions of the treaty which we have reserved, but leave the treaty binding upon all those who have signed it as it is.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I desire to ask, then, whether the Senator from Connecticut agrees with his colleague, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], who declares that he will never be satisfied with mere silence.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do agree with him, because, as I say, I want to make assurance doubly sure, because some people appear to doubt whether silence gives consent.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator draws a distinction between reservations and amendments, and states that reservations will not have to be submitted to the other nations.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I say that the resolution of ratification containing reservations will be deposited in Paris, where the other nations deposit their ratifications.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And if the other nations are silent, they are accepted; but the Senator from Idaho has said he will not be satisfied with silence.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Well, that may be.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Now, I ask the Senator from Connecticut whether he will be satisfied with silence?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; I will not. Although I say, as I understand it—not from any erudite learning upon the subject, because I am a new and tenderfoot person in this treaty-making business, and I have not been a member of the Foreign Relations Committee very long—but I am told by those who profess to know, men like the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], who have had some experience in making treaties, that this question is so momentous and the results depending upon it are so tremendous, that it would not do any harm to provide in our resolution of ratification, if we make reservations, that we ratify upon condition that the four or five great powers—for we do not care much about the rest of them in this matter—agree to them. Now, if the doctrine is true that they agree to them, if they do not affirmatively disagree, then they can have no objection to saying that they agree to them, as far as I can see; but, in any event, it would not necessitate the reopening of the peace conference or the resubmission of the treaty.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. As I understand the Senator from Connecticut, he takes the position that if we propose amendments to the treaty, it must be resubmitted for the ratification of the others.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Oh, I think so, beyond question.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But that if we simply attach reservations to the resolution of ratification, there would be no necessity for a resubmission.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator understands me correctly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then, if we express one idea in the form of an amendment to the treaty and accomplish a modification of the treaty by a reservation—for instance, if we reserve article 10 and do not consent to be bound by it—it would not have to be resubmitted; but if we propose an amendment to strike out article 10, it would have to be resubmitted.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If we carry an amendment to strike out article 10 or any other article, it changes the treaty itself.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is to say, if it is proposed in the form of an amendment it must be resubmitted, but if exactly the same end is accomplished by a reservation it does not have to be resubmitted?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Exactly, so far as this country is concerned. If you strike out anything from the treaty you have altered the body of the treaty to which the other nations have agreed. You have made a change in the text of the treaty. You are not considering the same instrument, and there would be no meeting of the minds, and the treaty would have to be submitted to the other nations to see whether they would agree to amending the treaty. Now, if we put in the resolution of ratification certain reservations their treaty stands just as it is and we sign the treaty just as it is, but say in the resolution of ratification that it is distinctly understood that when we exchange ratifications we ratify this treaty upon the understanding that we are not bound by article 10, or that we insist upon the Monroe doctrine being interpreted by us as we have heretofore interpreted it, and so forth. That leaves the treaty just as it was submitted to us and agreed upon by Great Britain, but it simply takes us out of those provisions, leaving the treaty as between the other nations just as it is. Do I make myself plain to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think so. I think the Senator's position is perfectly clear, that, so far as we are concerned, you can accomplish the same end by putting it in the shape of a reservation without resubmission that you can by putting it in the form of an amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator for a little further elucidation along that same line?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. Suppose the treaty were made between two nations and it contained this article 10. Suppose it were made between this Nation and Great Britain, whereby each of them agreed to protect the territorial integrity of the other, and we, by a ratification agreement or by a ratification reservation, declared that we would not abide by article 10. Is not that, in all effects and to all intents and purposes, an amendment of that treaty by us?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I could not say that it was, Mr. President. I take the position that the Senator from Montana appears to take, that we would have accomplished the same purpose by the reservation, but it would not be an amendment of the treaty.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the Senator must not attribute that to me.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I was simply endeavoring to elucidate the ideas of the Senator from Connecticut. I differ radically.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Oh, well, I beg the Senator's pardon, then. I withdraw it.

Mr. McCUMBER. My own view is that it is an amendment of the treaty; that the minds of the nations, therefore, have not met upon that treaty at that time, and therefore we would be exactly in the same position as though we had stricken out article 10. Of course, I will admit that in either instance by acquiescence the other nation may put itself in a position where it is estopped from denying that it has agreed to release us from that contract.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator means exactly what he says. I do not think he can mean to say that a mere reservation in the ratification resolution is an amendment of the treaty. The treaty can not be amended except by changing its text, and a reservation in a resolution of ratification does not touch the treaty at all. It leaves the text just as it came to us.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota a question, in view of what he has said. If this Government rejects the treaty in toto, does he think the treaty is rejected by all of the nations who have entered into it?

Mr. McCUMBER. Why, certainly not; but we have changed the treaty so far as we are concerned, and we may have so changed the purposes of the treaty that each of the other nations have the right to say they repudiate it because it does not take within its confines the United States. Therefore, they may repudiate it because it is not the treaty which they signed, because the treaty which they signed bound the United States to do certain things, and they signed it upon the assumption that the United States would agree to the same things that they have agreed to do. Therefore they may acquiesce in it as between themselves, or they may say, and rightfully say, that "Inasmuch as one of the greatest powers has refused to be bound by certain conditions, therefore the very consideration which governed us in entering into this treaty has been violated, and we will repudiate it."

Mr. LENROOT. They might say that; but does the Senator contend that the rejection of the treaty by the United States nullifies the signatures of all of the other nations parties to the treaty?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I say simply that it does this—that it destroys the consideration upon which the signatures were given, and therefore entitles each one of the other nations to repudiate it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, that can not possibly be so. If France and Great Britain and Italy ratify this treaty, and Germany ratifies it, it is provided right in the body of the treaty that it shall be in existence, whether we sign it or not. I read from an editorial in the New York Sun to-day——

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me say to the Senator before he proceeds, that the treaty says it shall be obligatory upon those nations which sign it; but what treaty? The treaty which is written, and the treaty which is written requires things to be done by the United States, and when the United States says that it will not do those things therefore it is not the same treaty.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does the Senator take the ground that if any nation of the 42 refuses to sign the treaty, the treaty can not be operative among the other 41?

Mr. McCUMBER. No. Mr. President, I take the ground that if any one of them has signed the treaty as it now is, and it obligates the United States to do certain things, and the United States says she will not do those things, that will authorize any other signatory nation to say that it would repudiate it also and would not consent to be bound by it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not agree with the Senator, but there is no use in discussing it.

I desire to read an editorial appearing in the New York Sun of to-day:

A GREAT METHODIST CHURCHMAN EXPOSES MR. WILSON'S LEAGUE.

The Rev. Thomas Benjamin Neely, a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, whose labors in behalf of sound citizenship and good Americanism have brought him reputation not second to that his services to his church have earned for him, has written and published an analysis of the league of nations into which President Wilson is endeavoring to force the United States which for clarity of thought, moderateness of phraseology, and soundness of political doctrine must command the respectful attention of all thoughtful students of our affairs.

Bishop Neely approaches the problems involved in the project for a league of nations in no spirit of antagonism. His professional training, his ministry of many years duration here and abroad, his observations of the horrors of war, all unite to predispose him to champion any practicable plan that may be put forward for the preservation of honorable peace. Yet with the most charitable disposition he is unable to support the scheme for which President Wilson, arrogating to himself a representative capacity he was not entitled to, bartered and compromised in the dark in Paris. Bishop Neely reaches the conclusion to which other straight-seeing Americans have been forced after a study of the covenant, that it sets up a supersovereignty incalculably menacing to the independence of the United States, to which the American people should never give their assent, much less pledge their active material and moral support.

We can not in this place adequately review the careful and painstaking analysis of the history of the Wilson league as Bishop Neely has written it from available official data, the addresses of men in public life, and the columns of the newspaper and periodical press. He has gone deeply—as deeply as the secrecy maintained by President Wilson will permit any American to go—into the record of this singular enterprise. With scrupulous care he has given due weight to the aspirations of idealism, and he has not allowed himself to be prejudiced by the fact that occasionally even idealism must compromise with existing and potent conditions. But he has refused to be blinded to the facts or to discard his knowledge of men and nations in his consideration of a constitution designed to regulate the relations of men with their fellows. Good sense marks his inquest, and good sense marks his rejection of the Wilson league and his plea to his fellow Americans to save themselves from it.

Having recalled the splendid history of the United States as a power for the good of mankind, Bishop Neely declares that "any power or combination that seeks in any way to control the United States of America so as to destroy its political independence in any sense or in any degree should be instantly and eternally rejected, and any proposition that involves this should be spurned, and that with contempt." Then:

"The so-called league of nations implies such a proposition and involves the destruction of independence and the loss of national sovereignty, and therefore should by every true American be immediately and emphatically refused."

Considering the possibility of amending the covenant, Bishop Neely wisely says:

"It may be said that the league may be changed, but no matter what changes may be made in it, as long as it retains the governing feature its real character is not affected.

"Article 10 may be removed and the Monroe doctrine may be better guarded, and yet there will remain many things that make the nation in the league a subject nation under the government of the league, and as long as these things exist, and the governing element persists, the member nation has lost its sovereignty.

"That is the essential feature of the league of nations.

"It is an overgovernment with the nations subject to it, and the United States must keep out or lose its political independence, no matter what reservations are made."

The suggestion advanced by some advocates of the league that the United States might join it and quit the association if it proves unsatisfactory, Bishop Neely likens to telling a man to take poison as an experiment; it is "not only dangerous but absurdly foolish." His general conclusions are summed up in these sentences:

"The league of nations is destructive of nationality, and especially of American nationality, and if the American people get to understand what the league is in all its bearings they will make short work with the league of nations, that seeks to govern the world and destroy the sovereignty of the United States of America.

"The so-called league of nations is a political government to govern the world.

"The nation that enters will be ruled by it.

"Then the nations would cease to be 'powers,' the power of the world would be in the league, and the power of the league would be in the hands of four or five men, the making of the world's greatest despotism.

"The United States of America would lose its independence by going into it.

"The present duty is to reject the league and save the Nation."

We commend Bishop Neely's words to those who have felt that good morals and Christian generosity urged the acceptance of President Wilson's scheme of world government, and who consequently, though their minds counseled another course, have stifled their objections as a sacrifice to a higher duty. It will set them straight in their thinking and put a curb on their untutored impulses. Bishop Neely has performed a splendid service to his country in exposing the whole design in its enormity, for he has brought to the discussion of this subject a disinterested and enlightened patriotism which recognizes clearly the solemn obligation of Americans to preserve for the benefit of the world the institutions of our Government.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I regret very much that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] has left the Chamber. I desired to ask him a question in connection with his discussion of the subject of reservations, namely, if we should ratify the treaty with reservations in the resolution of ratification, such as he suggested, whether that would leave Germany free to modify her resolution of ratification of the treaty by reservations. She has ratified the treaty, as we understand, exactly as it stands, with all obligations on all nations as therein written. We put our interpretation upon certain provisions of it. We limit by reservation the necessary effect of certain provisions of the treaty, so far as we are concerned. Germany has signified her willingness to take it exactly as it stands. But we are not willing to take it as it stands. We want certain reservations. I would like to inquire of the Senator from Minnesota whether Germany might then recall her ratification of the treaty as it stands, whether she would be at liberty to reconsider her ratification at all, and whether she would be at liberty to propose other reservations, and if she declined to accept the reservations we propose or if she accepted them on condition that other reservations which she proposed were accepted by the other nations and we refused to accept her reservations, what would be the relation then between this country and Germany? Would we have peace and would we have any treaty with Germany, and if the treaty actually went into effect between Germany and the other nations what course would be open to us with respect to Germany?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I do not see the Senator from Minnesota on the floor. I understand he was called out on business.

Mr. KELLOGG entered the Chamber.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I see the Senator has entered the Chamber. I am very desirous of ascertaining from the Senator from Minnesota what his view would be, if we adopt a resolution of ratification with reservations such as those suggested by him, with respect to the action of Germany. Germany has ratified the treaty exactly as it stands. If we adopted a resolution of ratification with reservations such as those suggested by the Senator from Minnesota, would Germany then be at liberty to rescind her resolution of ratification? Would she be at liberty to accept the reservations proposed by us, provided we should accept reservations proposed by her, and if she proposed reservations, as we do, and they were not acceptable to us, then what would be the relations between us and Germany?

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I take it that if the position of the Senator from Montana is correct as to the construction of the treaty our reservations do not change the terms of the treaty, and Germany's ratification ends it. If Germany insists that it does change the treaty she could refuse to accept it or she could exchange notes and say it was not satisfactory. But does the Senator imagine that Germany is now in any position to claim that it changes the treaty and that she will not accept it? I do not think Germany is in any such position, and I think it is raising a very doubtful objection to defeat a perfectly plain, simple, and justifiable statement of our position as to the meaning of the treaty.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, with all due respect to the Senator from Minnesota, I was not asking for an answer upon the assumption that I had interpreted the treaty correctly. I am asking the Senator from Minnesota whether I am right or wrong in my interpretation of it. If we do put such reservations in the resolution of ratification, then what right has Germany? Does her ratification stand, or is she at liberty to withdraw her ratification and propose reservations?

Mr. KELLOGG. She would be at liberty to object and claim that she had not ratified the reservations, if she wished to do so, if she claims that the reservations change the language and effect of the instrument.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then I desire to ask the Senator from Minnesota, Germany having made her treaty with the other nations, whether we would be then in a situation to compel Germany to sign the treaty with these reservations in it?

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not think there is any possibility of Germany objecting, or being in any position to object, to those reservations.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Is it the position of the Senator that Germany will be obliged to accept any reservations we may propose?

Mr. KELLOGG. She was obliged to accept the treaty and she will be obliged to accept the reservations.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly. She was obliged to accept the treaty because she was forced to do so by the combined nations of the earth when they were occupying her territory with their military forces. What I desire to know from the Senator is if the situation would not be materially changed when she has negotiated a treaty with all the other great powers and our forces are withdrawn from her territory?

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not think she would be in any different position.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I desire to ask the Senator from Minnesota another question. I understood the Senator to say that if we made a reservation by which we declared we should not be bound by article 10 at all the league would otherwise be in force among all the other nations.

Mr. KELLOGG. No. I said if we struck article 10 entirely from the treaty we would be in the position of insisting that that article should not be in the treaty, not only as to this country but as between other countries, while if we put in a reservation that we were not bound to employ our military and naval forces except when Congress should vote it, the nations would have to accept it with that reservation. They could ratify it as between themselves with any understanding they saw fit and it would still be a treaty with whatever interpretation they wished to put upon it between themselves.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But if we put in a reservation which practically amounted to an abrogation of article 10, so far as we are concerned, does the Senator think that article 10 would still be in force and effect among the other signatory nations?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes; I think so as between the other nations.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Does not the Senator think that our participation in the matter is so much a consideration as that all the other nations would feel obligated to withdraw?

Mr. KELLOGG. I have no knowledge as to whether England, France, and Italy place the same interpretation upon article 10 as the President does or not. The President's construction of article 10 is that we reserve for ourselves the decision of what we will do to carry out the treaty obligations and that there is no binding obligation upon us to employ our military or naval forces, or any other forces, which the Congress can alone invoke. But England and France may have some other interpretation to be placed upon that article. I feel that England, France, and Italy are much more interested in the stability of the new nations reared as a result of the war than we are. They are in their neighborhood, they adjoin them. Their stability much more affects those countries than it affects us. I take it that nothing but a world conflict like this would ever induce the American Congress to send an army to Europe. I take it England and France might employ their military forces when we would not. The President says that the obligation is for Congress to interpret. I do not know what position England, France, and Italy may take as to the proper interpretation of article 10.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That really was not the question I asked. The question I asked does not depend upon the question of interpretation at all. Suppose a reservation were attached which practically exonerates us from any obligation under article 10 and we decline to be bound by article 10 by any construction that might be given to it, I ask the Senator whether article 10 is not so much a consideration operating between the other nations as would induce them all to withdraw their undertaking to be bound by article 10?

Mr. KELLOGG. I could not say what their position would be in that regard.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] that I am rather inclined to think that the President's position is not as he says it is. I base that statement upon the President's cablegram sent to his secretary May 10, 1919, in relation to the now pending treaty between France, England, and the United States. In that cablegram the President said:

> Happily there is no mystery or privacy about what I have promised the Government here. I have promised to propose to the Senate a supplement in which we shall agree, subject to the approval of the council of the league of nations, to come immediately to the assistance of France in case of unprovoked attack by Germany, thus merely hastening the action to which we should be bound by the covenant of the league of nations.

In other words, Mr. President, the President of the United States says we are bound to go to the relief of not only France and England, but every other country which signs the covenant of the league of nations or the peace treaty, and therefore I think the construction put upon the President's position by the Senator from Minnesota is not as announced in this cablegram.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the matter before the Senate is the resolution offered by me some days ago. I desire to say a few words with respect to that, if it is to be taken up for disposition this afternoon, but I have no desire to press it if Senators desire to talk on any other matter that is before the Senate. If they do not, Mr. President, I desire to say just a few words with respect to it.

Mr. POINDEXTER rose.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question to get his own opinion in elucidation of what has just been said?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I shall be glad to answer the Senator's question.

Mr. McCUMBER. Suppose the Senate of the United States, in its resolution of ratification, provides that "the Senate ratifies and confirms the treaty with the following amendment:

Add at the end of article 10 the words 'The provisions of this article shall not apply to the United States.'" Now, suppose, on the other hand, that the Senate, in its resolution of ratification, merely recites that the Senate confirms and ratifies the treaty with the understanding that article 10 does not apply to the United States. Is there any essential difference whatever in the effect of the two resolutions?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In my opinion there is not.

Mr. McCUMBER. Both of them, in effect, amend the treaty in so far as the United States is bound.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I fully agree with the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Therefore it would be up to the other nations to determine whether they saw fit to accept it or not in its modified form.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I quite agree with the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. They could do so, or they might leave it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I might say as to my own view about the matter, if it is of consequence to anyone, we can not accomplish any different result by denominating a thing an amendment or a reservation or an interpretation. If the action of the Senate, whatever it may be, is concurrent with the ratification resolution and is to be interpreted as a part of it, the effect is the same whether you denominate it a reservation or an amendment. If, after ratification, a resolution is adopted to the effect that article so-and-so is interpreted thus by the Senate, that is an interpretative resolution. I can not bring myself to believe that there can be any difference whatever in the effect, whatever the thing is denominated.

Under the ordinary proceeding, if the amendment line is followed, some one will tender an amendment to the treaty, and then the resolution of ratification will come and the treaty as amended will be ratified. Under the other plan the proposed change is to state in the resolution of ratification "that the treaty be ratified with the following reservation." I am sure that the method pursued can not possibly have any effect upon the operation of the treaty.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I agree with the Senator that the effect upon the duty of this country would be the same whether it is an amendment or a reservation in the resolution of ratification; but I am sure the Senator does not claim that the effect would be the same as to subsequent proceedings under the treaty. The Senator must know that if we amend the treaty, the other nations have got to act upon that amendment, and if they agree to it it is a different treaty. The Senator knows that if we simply make a reservation in the resolution of ratification, it is the same treaty holding good as between those who have not made reservations, but have signed it as it is, only we are left out on those points upon which we have made reservations.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; I do not agree with the Senator. I agree that a treaty amended by the Senate, if that is the proper expression, can become effective by the acquiescence of the other countries, just the same as a treaty ratified with a reservation may become effective by their acquiescence or by their express acceptance.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have not said anything about that. I said if the Senate makes an amendment to the treaty and the other nations agree to it we have a different treaty, whereas if the Senate makes a reservation we simply have changed the obligation of this country under the treaty and let the treaty stand as it is as to the other nations. Can not the Senator perceive that distinction?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not agree with the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator sees what I mean?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator will permit me, I wish to make this observation about his supposition, or at least about his query as to what Germany could do with this treaty.

The Senator made some inquiry as to whether, if we should make a reservation by amendment, Germany might not reconsider the ratification of the treaty which she has already given. Mr. President, it seems to me that that is perfectly impossible. Germany has made the treaty and signed it. No matter what we do, she can not get out of the obligation she has incurred by signing the treaty. Great Britain has signed the same treaty. What we do has no effect on them. A nation can not sign a treaty and then reconsider its action.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It seems rather odd to me that we can propose a treaty to Germany so far as we are concerned and Germany can ratify it, and then we propose some substantial amendment to the treaty and Germany is bound by her ratification already made.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is not the case. This is not a treaty between two nations. It is a treaty among a great many nations. The nations which ratify it are bound by it among themselves whether we ratify it or not. I trust nobody will assume that if all the 41 nations who are to constitute the league ratify the treaty as it was drawn and submitted by the peace conference and we stay out the whole thing falls to the ground. They are all mutually bound to each other whether we go in or not.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. There is not the slightest doubt about that. The treaty itself provides that it shall be effective when signed by Germany and any three of the leading powers. Undoubtedly it is in force and effect as against them. But I am inquiring what is the status with respect to this country? Have we any treaty with Germany?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly not, if we do not ratify it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly; and if we ratify with reservations, then what right has Germany in the premises? Is she bound by her prior ratification, or may she say that ratification does not go as to the United States, except with the following reservations? That is what I am inquiring about.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. As I understand it, and I think I do, if we make reservations and all the other nations refuse to agree to our reservations and notify us to that effect, they are all bound to each other and we have no treaty.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But I am inquiring about the relation of this country and not of other countries.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is what I am saying.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. We would have no treaty with Germany?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Absolutely none.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. What, then, would be our status?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. We can make a separate treaty with Germany, if we want to.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In the meantime our military forces are withdrawn from her territory.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. They are withdrawn whenever the Commander in Chief orders them withdrawn. He states that the war is over. There are many good authorities who hold that we are at peace with Germany whenever three powers sign the treaty with Germany, whether we do it or not; that war is estopped as a question of fact; and when the President of the United States informed Congress that the war was over and then affixed his signature to this peace treaty, together with the foreign nations making peace, peace exists between us and Germany whether we ratify the treaty or not. On that I express no opinion. I think it is a close question.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am very glad the Senator does so, because I should dislike to believe that the Senate of the United States was so insignificant a part of the treaty-making power.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], who has been Secretary of State and Attorney General of the United States, takes that view. I confess I am not able to follow him in it, whether it makes the Senate insignificant or not. I say, many good authorities do take that view.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I wish to ask the Senator from Montana what we would lose if Germany should fail to ratify the treaty, or, to state it in another form, what are we going to get out of this treaty? What is the United States going to gain for itself by this treaty with Germany?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should like to answer the Senator by asking another question. What does the Senator think we ought to get out of the treaty or out of the war?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I would rather the Senator would answer my question first.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. We will let it stand at that, then.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Well, I shall be glad to answer the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I will say, however, to the Senator that I am sure the treaty guarantees to the people of the United States all at least that they ever expected out of the war.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Well, we must have expected very little.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. They were not expecting very much, except to protect and defend their own rights and guarantee the people of the United States against a repetition of the aggression from which they suffered and which drove them into the war.

Mr. POINDEXTER. We went into the war in self-defense.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I agree with the Senator that we did not gain many selfish advantages out of the war.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Well, I think we gained a great many selfish advantages, but we do not gain them by the treaty. We gained them by the destruction of the German military power by our Army on the battle field. That is what we gained. We gained the safety of the United States and the liberty of its people. We did not go into the war merely for the altruistic purpose of doing a benefit to foreign nations. We went into it for our own benefit, and that benefit was the destruction or the subjection of the German military power, and that has already been accomplished.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I shall be interested at some time to hear from the Senator as to what provisions of the treaty we ought to have had for the further protection and for the further advantage of the United States.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is quite a long story.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; I did not expect the Senator to answer to-day.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I thought the Senator would want me to answer right away.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; the Senator may take his time about it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Very well.

TREATY WITH FRANCE.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, touching the Senate resolution, No. 154, now before the Senate, I introduced the resolution because the matter in regard to which it asks the Judiciary Committee to inquire transcends in importance even the very great and important treaty to which it refers. My own view about the matter is, as expressed by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] so eloquently this morning, quoting, indeed, the language of Alexander Hamilton, that if views expressed upon this floor concerning the power of the United States in entering into treaties shall be sustained the treaty-making power has vanished; it has no importance whatever. So, Mr. President, it occurred to me that it would be exceedingly helpful, not only in the discussion of the important matters now before us but for the guidance of the Senate in the future, to have something like an authoritative declaration upon the part of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, at least concerning this most important matter.

The question of whether the treaty under consideration referred to in the resolution does, as a matter of fact, transcend the constitutional power of the Government has not been elaborately presented. The contrary view we heard presented with great fullness and learning by the Senator from Minnesota this morning. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] some time ago, I recall very distinctly, advised the Senate that at some time he would address the Senate in support of the contention that the covenant of the league of nations is violative of the Constitution of the United States; I believe the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] expressed a similar conviction; but I say that none of the Senators has entered upon an elaborate discussion or presentation on that side of the question. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] proposed rather than argued the question in his speech of December 18, 1918, wherein he said:

> Suppose that it were proposed that the United States should bind itself in advance by treaty to go to war in given circumstances. Under the Constitution war can be declared only by the Congress. How could the President, by negotiating a treaty, and the Senate by consenting to its ratification, bind this country to declare war? A declaration of war is, under the Constitution, a prerogative of the Congress. The appropriations to initiate or to conduct war are in the discretion of the Congress.

Again, Mr. President, in his speech of March 1, 1919, the Senator from Pennsylvania spoke as follows:

> We come now to the second question I propose, Do the provisions of the supposed covenant strike down the precepts of the Constitution? A mere listing of some of the more conspicuous provisions of each shows that it does.
> Under the Constitution the Congress of the United States has the exclusive power to declare war. The proposed covenant puts the power of declaring war in the hands of the executive council, in which, it is true, we have a voice, but not the constitutional voice. Thus, whether Congress wishes or not, whether the people wish or not, we may be forced into war, with all its sacrifices of life, in a cause in which we have no real concern and with which we may be out of sympathy, under the penalty that if we do not go to war we shall, by breaking a covenant of the league, bring war upon ourselves by the balance of the world.

When the treaty with France was submitted to the Senate, Mr. President, and reference to the fact was made in the public press, one of the newspapers printed in this city contained a statement which I wish to read. It will be remembered that the remarks which I have quoted from the speeches of the Senator from Pennsylvania were made not with reference to the treaty with France but with reference to the general treaty and that they had reference to the provisions of the covenant of the league of nations. In this press account of the presentation of the treaty with France the following appears:

> Informal discussion among Senators to-day developed that opposition to the special defensive treaty with France, which was sent to the Senate yesterday by President Wilson, is likely to be centered along two general lines: that it is directly antagonistic to the tradition of no entangling alliances, and that it subverts the constitutional right of Congress to determine questions of war or peace.
> Although the President has taken the position that the treaty is not properly an alliance, Senator BORAH, Republican, Idaho, and others maintain that it has all the force of the alliances which have been common among European nations. In the view of this group the treaty will be even more in contradiction of American traditions than article 10 of the league of nations covenant, under which the members of the league would "undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity" of all members of the league.

As I have stated, I believe it would be exceedingly helpful if we had something like an authoritative expression from the Judiciary Committee upon this subject.

The practice of asking the Judiciary Committee for an opinion upon subjects of this kind is well established in the proceedings of the Senate. That committee is particularly charged with the consideration of questions of the powers of Congress under the Constitution. All joint resolutions proposing amendments to the Constitution are referred to that committee.

On February 20, 1896, the Senate submitted to that committee the following resolution:

> Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and is hereby, directed to inquire and report to the Senate whether, under the provisions of the river and harbor act approved July 13, 1892, the resolution mentioned in the last paragraph of that law is required to be a joint resolution, and whether concurrent resolutions generally are required to be submitted to the President of the United States.

That presented a very interesting constitutional question, upon which the Judiciary Committee submitted a very elaborate report.

Indeed, Mr. President, the same practice obtains in the other House as well, as witness the report submitted by Mr. Tucker, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to the House of Representatives on the 3d of March, 1885, in response to a resolution reading as follows:

> Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be directed to report to the House whether the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, can negotiate treaties with foreign Governments by which the duties levied by Congress on importations can be changed or abrogated.

That question was canvassed at length this morning by the Senator from Minnesota, and is likewise involved in the general treaty.

Mr. President, with these observations I submit the resolution for the action of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution submitted by the Senator from Montana.

The resolution (S. Res. 154) was agreed to, as follows:

> Whereas doubts have been expressed as to the authority of the treaty-making power under the Constitution to enter into the treaty with France, submitted to the Senate for ratification on the 29th day of July, 1919: Therefore be it
> Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and it hereby is, requested to inquire and advise the Senate as to whether there are any constitutional obstacles to the making of the said treaty.

ASSESSMENT WORK ON MINING CLAIMS.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Out of order, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 150) to suspend the requirements of annual assessment work on certain mining claims during the year 1919, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution just reported by him. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, not knowing the full text of the joint resolution and whether it applies to all mining claims or only to certain mining claims, unless the Senator will make an explanation, I should like to have the joint resolution read. Does it extend to placer as well as to lode mining claims?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It extends to all mining claims, with the limitation that it shall not apply to more than five claims in the possession of one claimant.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

> Resolved, etc., That the provision of section 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States which requires on each mining claim located, and until a patent has been issued therefor, not less than $100 worth of labor to be performed or improvements aggregating such amount to be made during each year, be, and the same is hereby, suspended during the calendar year 1919: Provided, That no such suspension shall be granted to any one claimant for more than five claims: Provided, That every claimant of any such mining claim in order to obtain the benefits of this resolution shall file or cause to be filed in the office where the location notice or certificate is recorded, on or before December 31, 1919, a notice of his desire to hold said mining claim under this resolution.

SEC. 2. That this resolution shall not be construed to alter, modify, amend, or repeal the public resolution entitled "Joint resolution to relieve the owners of mining claims who have been mustered into the military or naval service of the United States as officers or enlisted men from performing assessment work during the term of such service," approved July 17, 1917.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Washington, I will state to the Senator from Utah that the joint resolution now before the Senate and just reported by the chairman of the Committee on Mines and Mining, is in the exact form as it was passed by the House and came to the Senate.

On October 5, 1917, a joint resolution was approved by the President suspending the operation of the mining laws relative to assessment work. That joint resolution covered all mining claims. This joint resolution limits to five the number of claims on which assessment work may be suspended in the case of any one claimant.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. KING. If a similar joint resolution has passed the House, would it not be a good idea to take up the House joint resolution?

Mr. HENDERSON. This is the House joint resolution. It was considered by the Committee on Mines and Mining yesterday and reported favorably to-day; so that it is the same joint resolution that came over from the House on August 1.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator explain, if the Senator from Washington will permit the Senator from Nevada to do so——

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator from Washington, I am sure, can give the Senator from Utah any information he desires.

Mr. KING. Why there was a limitation to five mining claims owned by any one corporation or individual?

Mr. POINDEXTER. That was the result of a compromise between a conflict of views. That was adopted by the House and the Senate committee agreed unanimously to it, both on the merits and also because, owing to the lateness of the season in the mountains, it was very desirable to get this legislation enacted. Rather than return it to the House, with the prospect of a protracted controversy about this particular matter, the Senate committee agreed to it.

Mr. KING. I will say to the Senator that, if I understand this measure correctly—I have not had a chance to examine it—I see no reason why there should be any limitation of the benefits of the act to five claims only, or less than five claims, by one individual or one corporation. It would seem to me that the reasons which call for legislation at all exempting the owners of mining claims from the annual assessments would provide that the exemption should extend to the owner of 10 claims as well as to the owner of 1 claim. The reason for the joint resolution, I apprehend, rests in the fact that labor is scarce and that it will be difficult to secure sufficient labor to perform the annual assessments upon the mining claims in the mountains and throughout the mineral districts of the United States.

If I thought it would not jeopardize the passage of the measure, I should move to amend it so as to strike out the limitation. It seems to me it ought to extend to all mining claims, regardless of the number which may be held by one individual.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am very much afraid that if the Senator did that, it would jeopardize the passage of the joint resolution and make it extremely doubtful whether it would pass, especially whether it would pass in time to be of benefit this season.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I may suggest, in reply to the Senator from Utah, that I think one of the leading reasons for the action of the House in placing that limitation in the joint resolution was to prevent speculation in the holding of mining claims whereby, knowing that no assessments would be required this year, a man might go out into the hills and file on an unlimited number of claims, with no intention whatever of doing the assessment work provided by law. It also had the effect of carrying on a certain amount of work. In the case of 10 claims, which the Senator may admit is perhaps not an unreasonable number, the owner could possibly arrange for the assessment work on five claims without either unduly burdening his pocket or being put to inconvenience to secure the necessary labor, whereas the smaller number would not be objectionable.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, the first objection which the Senator has suggested would be easily met by a provision in the joint resolution that its provisions should not be taken advantage of by any person who filed upon mining claims or located them after a given date, and that date might be fixed as of the passage of the joint resolution, or June 1, or some preceding date; but it does seem to me that there will be very serious inconvenience with the limitation which the measure contains. The Senator has in mind the law and the regulations passed pursuant to the law under which work may be done upon one claim for the benefit of a large number where they constitute one group. I can foresee very grave difficulties arising from an attempt to secure the benefit of this act limited to only five claims where there may be a group of claims.

Mr. PHIPPS. I do not think that objection is very practical or important. It seems to me that unless action is taken now on this joint resolution the benefit proposed to be conferred upon the owners of mines will come too late to enable them to avail themselves of it. In other words, if this measure must go back to the House it may be a month or two before action can be had, and that will throw it too late in the season for the miners to get into the hills. They are asking to-day for a decision on this question. I might take the time to read a telegram or two that I have received on this subject, if the Senator will pardon me one moment.

Mr. KING. Let me say to the Senator, while he is finding his telegram, that I shall not object to the consideration of the joint resolution. Indeed, I shall vote for it; but I believe a mistake is being made in the limitation to which I have referred, and if I thought, as I suggested a moment ago, that it would not jeopardize the passage of the joint resolution, I should move to amend it.

Mr. PHIPPS. The telegrams are merely asking for immediate action.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, I think there are quite a number of us who agree with the Senator from Utah; but under the circumstances the committee felt—I think I may say so, as the chairman is here—that it was better to pass the joint resolution as it came from the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no amendment to be proposed the joint resolution will be reported to the Senate.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Washington if there can be any controversy over the interpretation which should be placed and will be placed on these words:

> That no suspension shall be granted to any one claimant for more than five claims.

Take the case, for instance, of two or three persons who are jointly interested in claims—joint locators, for instance. Suppose there are three individuals who have located 10 claims. When the joint resolution uses the words "one claimant" would that be construed as including the three individuals who were jointly interested in five claims?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the Senator is fully competent to interpret it. I would interpret it to mean that if a corporation owned five claims, or more than five claims, that particular corporation could not have the benefit of this act for more than five claims. If a partnership owned five or more, that particular partnership could not have the benefit of the act for more than five. If an individual owned more than five, he could not have the benefit of it for more than five.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if this joint resolution passes at all it should retain this limitation, in my judgment.

The act of 1872, under which practically all mining locations have been made, as an evidence of good faith required the bona fide expenditure upon every mining claim prior to patent of not less than $100. The operation of that requirement has been, I think, beneficial. No limitation is placed by the law upon the number of claims which a citizen may locate, and in many sections of my State, and I have no doubt in others, that privilege has been taken advantage of by the location of a large number of claims held either for speculative purposes or upon the contingency of some development in the neighborhood proving valuable, and thereby making the groups valuable. That practice has interfered, I will not say frequently but occasionally, with the bona fide development of mining property by holding out of the public domain premises which many citizens would like to exploit; but they were unable to do so because of these preexisting locations.

I do not believe in suspending such a requirement in the absence of extraordinary conditions, and not then unless the necessity for it is overwhelming. This provision of the law was very severely criticized in the West in the elections of 1872. It was inserted in the bill at the instance of the then Delegate to Congress from Colorado, afterwards United States Senator, Jerome B. Chaffee. He was a candidate that year for reelection upon the Republican ticket, and a very vigorous fight was waged against him because of what was dubbed in the campaign the Chaffee requirement of the expenditure of $100 upon these claims prior to patent. Mr. Chaffee's answer seemed to me to be conclusive, as it certainly was to the people of the Territory, who returned him by an increased majority to Congress. It was that the privilege of unlimited location ought to carry with it a sense of obligation to the Government; that the man who would locate a claim and then be unwilling to spend $100 upon it did not appeal very strongly to him as a bona fide locator. He also called attention to the fact that this annual expenditure can be terminated at any time by securing patent for the claim, and patent can be secured, the law having been complied with otherwise, upon the expenditure of at least $500 in the improvement of the claim. So that those who do not like to pay this assessment can easily terminate it by applying for and securing patents; and, of course, the receiver's receipt, being the entry or the equivalent of a patent, suspends the work as soon as the money is paid to the Government for the claim.

The panic of 1893 struck the western mining interests very hard. During the summer of that year the Indian mints suspended the coinage of the rupee, and the subsequent business disaster to the world is of too recent occurrence for me to do more than refer to it.

Congress during that year by special act suspended the operation of this law, relieving the holders of mining claims in the West from the necessity of making this expenditure. With that exception, I think no suspension was made, although it may have been asked for, until last year and the year before, when, owing to the pendency of the European war, the operation of this requirement was again suspended.

One great drawback to the suspension of these requirements is that once it is done it operates as a precedent, and those having the benefit of the suspension want its continuance, somewhat analogous to a man who, once having ridden upon an annual pass, never pays his fare without a sense of injustice. We are about to get into the habit, in other words, of suspending this requirement, and it is not good for the mining industry. If a man has a claim worth anything, he ought to be willing to pay $100 every year or patent it; and until he patents it there should be some overweening reason why the law itself should be suspended. I predict that if the joint resolution becomes a law, as it probably will, it having passed the House, we will repeat it next year. The high cost of living, the general turbulent conditions, and the scarcity of labor will all appeal to those who desire its suspension, and they will appeal to Congress.

Mr. PHIPPS. I would like to ask my colleague if it is not his understanding that, in addition to making the payment of $500 or doing the necessary work it is not obligatory for the locator to make a showing of metal ore in a paying quantity?

Mr. THOMAS. No; it is not necessary to make a showing of ore in paying quantities in order to receive a patent. The discovery of a vein or a deposit of metalliferous ore is necessary, but the courts have held that any appreciable quantity is sufficient for purposes of discovery and patent. Judge Hallett once held, arbitrarily, that an ounce of silver was the minimum. But that was questioned quite severely, and the departments have frequently held that a substantial trace of metallic content is all that is necessary.

Mr. PHIPPS. What has been the practice of the representatives of the Government in our forest reserves and in the Territories?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, my colleague is opening up another subject. The law is one thing and the regulation of the forest reserves is another. I have no doubt that what the Senator refers to is the regulations of the Forestry Service, which have improved upon and defined and sometimes overridden the law and many of the decisions of the Supreme Court by requirements within the boundaries of the reserves that are not recognized elsewhere.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I ask my colleague to yield while I submit certain telegrams which have been received from Colorado which have a bearing on the measure now under discussion.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator desires to have the telegrams read now, I will be very glad to yield for that purpose.

Mr. PHIPPS. I ask that the telegrams may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, they will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

DENVER, COLO., August 1, 1919.

Hon. L. C. PHIPPS,
Senate, Washington, D. C.:

What is prospect of prompt passage of resolution by Senate suspending assessment work, mining claims, 1919? Emergency demanding suspension during war still exists. Labor shortage, high cost of supplies, and need that labor should be engaged in productive employment urgent as ever. Necessary that we know probable action on resolution by Senate in order to hold men in mines, who must soon quit to do assessment work if law is not enacted. Labor shortage in mines acute.

COLORADO METAL MINING ASSOCIATION.

BOULDER, COLO., July 25, 1919.

Hon. CHARLES B. TIMBERLAKE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Have consulted a large number of business men. Unanimous opinion that law in operation during war suspending assessment work on mining claims be continued for 1919. A large number of men are not home yet, and some who are, financially unable to work their claims. All will probably be home by December 31, 1919.

FRANK E. ECKEL,
Secretary Boulder Commercial Association.

COLORADO SPRINGS, COLO., July 25, 1919.

CHARLES B. TIMBERLAKE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

We believe assessment work on mining claims should be suspended additional year. This is opinion of several prominent members of the chamber of commerce, only one of which is connected with mining business.

WILLIAM HITE, Secretary.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have received similar telegrams, and I think many more than the three which have been read. There is no question but that those to be benefited by the suspension are very anxious to see the joint resolution passed, and there is no question that there is a shortage of labor. But the reference to the high cost of labor is beside the question, because the law requires the expenditure of $100, and if the rate of wages is $10 per day, then the work of 10 men 1 day, or the work of 1 man 10 days, is all that is necessary.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator will remember, however—although, of course, I concede that the law of Congress is paramount—that in some of the mining districts there are prescribed the number of feet of excavation which must be made to be worth $100.

Mr. THOMAS. I will take the Senator's word for it, although I am not aware of the existence of such a requirement. In the State which I now in part represent here the discoverer of a claim who locates it is required to sink a shaft not less than 10 feet in depth, or deeper if necessary to expose a well-defined crevice, and the custom has been to consider the sinking of a 10-foot shaft thus required by the local law as the equivalent of $100. I take it that if it required 10 men 1 day to make an excavation of 1 foot in hard rock, that is just as much a compliance with the law as though it took 1 man 10 days to sink a shaft 15 feet deep in looser material. It is the bona fide cost of the work which is done by the owner of the claim. The shortage of labor is, of course, somewhat acute.

My principal objection to the joint resolution, which is somewhat minimized by this limitation, is that it enables a great number of people holding a large number of claims to escape the required development, which the law for the last 47 years has insisted upon as an evidence of good faith.

Of course, it would please those mine owners who have unpatented locations if we should repeal the law altogether. There is not any question about that, because naturally what is to the self-interest of the individual is a motive, and a very proper one, which I am not criticizing, a human motive, for requiring relief.

I do not care to say one thing more upon the subject, Mr. President.

I am rather glad that my colleague referred to conditions in the forest reserves. I sometimes wonder whether a man locating a claim in a forest reserve should be permitted to patent it at all. He certainly would not if those who are in charge of the system could find any legitimate or other means for preventing it. But, fortunately or unfortunately, as the case may be, in a large portion of the mining area claims located prior to the time of the inauguration of the forest-reserve system are still unpatented, and do not fall within the jurisdiction of the Forest Service.

The limitation to five claims made here, very thoughtfully inserted, will largely minimize the consequence which would follow if the suspension were general, and I do not feel disposed to offer any very strong objection to the passage of the joint resolution in its present shape, although I am opposed to the principle, and do not believe that the law should be suspended except in times of the very greatest emergency, of which this is not one.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I have received quite a number of letters from mining districts in different parts of my State, stating the obvious condition we are all acquainted with, that great mining corporations, at times holding vast areas of country, escape under the provision that is intended for the relief of men who are unable, in the stress of times like these, to do the work.

I would like the measure better if it were confined to two claims owned by any one individual, and I think there should be some provision in it that the man should show, by affidavit or otherwise, before the recorder to whom his claim for failure to do the work would be filed, that the real stress was on him individually; that he was unable to pay it; that he had to work every day for his own living and to protect his mining claim. I have no objection to such men being protected in these times, but I very seriously object to those who are perfectly able to do the work escaping it from year to year, holding the title against poor fellows who would probably like to take the claims and try to make something out of them.

I have a feeling somewhat like that of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], that inasmuch as this law will relieve a great number of men probably who ought to be relieved, I shall offer no strenuous objection to it, but if it does not hurt the joint resolution, in the opinion of the Senator having it in charge, I would like to reduce the limitation to two claims instead of five.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires to suggest that the joint resolution has passed the stage of amendment, and a reconsideration would be necessary in order to make the introduction of amendments proper.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I was not acquainted with the parliamentary situation, just having come into the Chamber. That being true, I would not like, for reasons obvious to all Senators present, to make a strenuous objection to it. However, I can not help protesting against this relief, which comes under the guise of helping the poor, but which gives a great deal of comfort to those who could easily afford to do their assessment work. The whole assessment-work proposition is wrong anyhow. There are some who hold title who are digging 10 feet of soft ground anywhere on the surface of the claim in order to keep the title perfect. But, Mr. President, if the joint resolution has gone beyond the point of amendment, I shall raise no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was passed.

COLD STORAGE AND OTHER REGULATIONS OF FOOD PRODUCTS.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire at this time, out of order, to introduce a bill which I ask to have read by its title, and then I wish to say just a word or two about it.

The bill (S. 2739) to prohibit interstate shipments or transportation of certain food products; to define and to prohibit transportation and sale of adulterated or misbranded food products; to regulate traffic therein; to define and regulate cold storage; to regulate dealing in cold-storage food products; and to fix penalties for violation, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire only to say at this time that I regard cold storage as one of the greatest discoveries of the modern age. Used properly, nothing is perhaps of greater advantage and use to the human race. On the other hand, one of the greatest causes of the present high prices of food products is the improper use of cold storage. From such investigation as I have made, I believe the packers and others who use it employ it in such manner as to be able to withhold from the market at will products that are kept in cold storage, and practically all meats are now so kept.

At some time in the near future I desire to address the Senate on this subject. I content myself now merely with introducing the bill and making this brief statement about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

JOINT MEETING OF THE TWO HOUSES.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I offer the following concurrent resolution and ask its immediate consideration.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 7) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the two Houses of Congress assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Friday, the 8th day of August, 1919, at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, for the purpose of receiving such communication as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make to them.

BOLSHEVIST GOVERNMENT OF RUSSIA.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have read from the desk a brief editorial, and I give notice that on Monday next, at the close of morning business or as soon thereafter as I can obtain the floor, I shall submit some remarks upon the subject of the editorial.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Washington? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the New York Times, May 30, 1919.]

AN APOLOGY DUE.

"Senator POINDEXTER in his place in the Senate charged the President with having delivered to the Congress on December 4, 1917, an address in which he spoke of the Bolshevist government in Russia as 'worthy of the admiration of every lover of mankind.' On December 4, 1917, the Kerensky government had been overthrown, but the Bolshevist government was not effectively set up, the social democrats still having a considerable voice in it. It was not until over a month later that they dispersed the constituent assembly by force and embarked on the wild career of absolutism.

"On December 4, 1917, the President did deliver an address to Congress. Its purpose was to ask for a declaration of war against Austria-Hungary. We find in it very little about Russia. He did say that if the real issues had been made plain from the beginning 'the sympathy and enthusiasm of the Russian people might have been once for all enlisted on the side of the Allies, suspicion and distrust swept away, and a real and lasting union of purpose effected.'

"Is that what Senator POINDEXTER means? It does not sound much like his quotation. The President also said:

"The Russian people have been poisoned by the very same falsehoods that have kept the German people in the dark, and the poison has been administered by the very same hands.

"That does not sound much like Senator POINDEXTER's quotation. Yet these two sentences are the only ones in which President Wilson on December 4, 1917, made any reference whatever to Russia. He made no reference whatever to the month-old Bolshevist government. Mr. POINDEXTER owes the President a retraction. He says he got the quotation out of a Bolshevist pamphlet. He ought to verify his quotations when he gets them from such a source."

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, August 8, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, August 7, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God, our Heavenly Father, we thank Thee for the rich and varied experiences which have come down to us out of the past; for the heritage of our fathers in a Government of the people; and we pray that, putting aside selfish ambitions and desires, we may in the present crisis live to the golden rule, and thus learn the lessons of the past and enjoy the heritage of our fathers, to the glory and honor of Thy holy name and happiness for ourselves. For Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, August 5, 1919, was read and approved.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill and joint resolution of the following titles:

H. R. 7110. An act extending the time for the construction of a bridge across Flint River in the State of Georgia; and

H. J. Res. 165. Joint resolution to allow the payment of bills lawfully incurred for construction work actually performed or construction material actually purchased and delivered prior to the approval of an act approved July 11, 1919 (Public, No. 7, 66th Cong., H. R. 5227).

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill and joint resolution of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 5032. An act to extend the franchise in parishes and separate congregations of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the District of Columbia; and

H. J. Res. 163. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of Labor to lease the Charleston immigration station and dock connected therewith.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that August 5 they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bill:

H. R. 3854. An act for the repeal of the daylight-saving law.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend for a moment. The Chair lays before the House a report from the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 165. Joint resolution to allow the payment of bills lawfully incurred for construction work actually performed or construction material actually purchased and delivered prior to the approval of an act approved July 11, 1919 (Public No. 7, 66th Cong., H. R. 5227).

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BROWNING, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. RUBEY, indefinitely, on account of business.

To Mr. RUCKER, indefinitely, on account of death in the family.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, was I recognized?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas rises to a question of personal privilege. The Chair thinks that takes precedence.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, in last Saturday's RECORD, August 2, page 3580, after certain remarks had been made by me concerning recent demands backed by threats made by the railroad brotherhoods, the following appears:

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

The SPEAKER. On what page?

Mr. BLANTON. Page 3580, at the top of the column:

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.
Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.
Mr. BURKE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes' time.
Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.
Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I must object to any more speeches not confined to the subject matter of the bill. We are trying to get these bills out of the way.
Mr. BURKE. I hope I shall be given time asked for to reply to the false statements just made here.

Now, I invite the Chair's attention particularly to this statement:

Mr. BURKE. I hope I shall be given time asked for to reply to the false statements just made here.

In the Fort Worth Star-Telegram, reporting the proceedings of Congress, made by the reporter of that paper, Mr. Leo R. Sack, staff correspondent, appears the following:

WASHINGTON, August 2.

Representative BLANTON, in a five-minute speech on the floor of the House * * * charged the railroad workers with "coming to Congress like highwaymen"—

And so on. Then he says:

Representative BURKE, of Pennsylvania, himself a member of the brotherhood, accused BLANTON of making false statements.

Based upon these excerpts that I have read, I submit to the Speaker that I have presented a question of personal privilege.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I am on the floor, presenting a question of personal privilege.

Mr. NOLAN. I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. BLANTON. I submit to the Speaker that that is a high privilege.

The SPEAKER. That certainly is a high privilege, and the Chair will recognize the gentleman. On the other hand, the point of no quorum can always be made before any business can be transacted. If the gentleman insists on his point of no quorum, the Chair must recognize him.

Mr. NOLAN. I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from California had better get a quorum of Republicans here by to-morrow at 4 o'clock or he and his party are going to be embarrassed, because the President is going to address Congress to-morrow.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves that the House do now adjourn. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands a division.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, on this I demand the yeas and nays. I want to find out how many men are here in Washington.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of taking the vote by yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Eight in the affirmative—not a sufficient number. The rule is that a fifth of the Members present can demand a quorum.

Mr. BLANTON. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. If there should be less than 40 men here, 8 would be a sufficient number?

The SPEAKER. Exactly.

Mr. BLANTON. And yesterday morning there were only 39, and last Saturday morning when the prayer was uttered there were only 7 besides the Speaker on the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. BLANTON. The other side, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count the other side to ascertain if there are more than 40 present. The gentleman must know there are, but the Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty-nine gentleman are present. Eight Members are not a fifth, and the yeas and nays are refused. The ayes have it, and the House stands adjourned until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Thereupon (at 12 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, August 8, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

SENATE.

FRIDAY, August 8, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we seek the guidance of Thy Holy Spirit through all the hours and amid all the duties of this day. May the day be clear and be spent in Thy light. May Thy Holy Spirit guide the way, and at its close may we have the comfortable satisfaction of having wrought the will of God and having been willing to obey the Lord's call to accomplish His work in the world. Hear us, we pray Thee, and fit us for the tasks of the day. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

PHOTOGRAPHIC EQUIPMENT (S. DOC. NO. 54, PT. 3).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 26th ultimo, certain information relative to photographic equipment under the control of the Air Service, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a joint resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of Nebraska ratifying the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women, which was ordered to be filed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the concurrent resolution of the Senate providing that the two Houses of Congress assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Friday, the 8th day of August, 1919, at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, for the purpose of receiving such communications as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make to them.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 7110. An act extending the time for the construction of a bridge across Flint River, in the State of Georgia; and

S. J. Res. 80. Joint resolution to authorize the President to convene a meeting of an international labor conference in Washington, D. C.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FLETCHER presented a resolution adopted by the National Wholesale Grocers' Association of the United States at their annual convention held in Cincinnati, Ohio, favoring the continuance of the present zone system of postage rates, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of Local Branch No. 509, National Association of Letter Carriers, of Tampa, Fla., praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

By Mr. MOSES:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 84) to provide additional compensation for employees in the Postal Service; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. McCORMICK. I desire to give notice of an amendment to the Standing Rules of the Senate, as follows:

Change section 3 of Rule XVI to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any appropriation bill, nor shall any amendment not germane or relevant to the subject matter contained in the bill be received; nor shall any amendment to any item or clause of such bill be received which does not directly relate thereto; and all questions of relevancy of amendments under this rule, when raised, shall be submitted to the Senate and be decided without debate, except by a two-thirds vote of the Senators present and voting thereon; and any amendment to a general appropriation bill may be laid on the table without prejudice to the bill."

FEDERAL BOARD FOR VOCATIONAL EDUCATION.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate and also of the Federal Board for Vocational Education to a part of a letter which I have received from one of the employees of the board. I do it with the hope that the officials of the Federal Board for Vocational Education will take notice of the letter if the conditions there existing are as outlined in the letter. I would gladly give the name of the employee, but he thinks it would be unwise, although he states that if a hearing is held he is perfectly willing to testify:

DEAR SENATOR: I feel impelled to call your attention to certain conditions that prevail in certain departments here.

I refer particularly to the Federal Board for Vocational Education, where a large number of colored men are drawing salaries for apparently doing nothing. Most of their time is spent in an adjacent alleyway, where they indulge in all sorts of pastime, such as shooting craps, matching pennies, and other forms of gambling and amusements. I venture to say that there are about 25 of these men of all ages in this building employed as messengers, I presume. It appears like every clerk is supplied with a messenger or a servant of some sort.

On a certain occasion not long ago I noticed a string of eight colored men unloading a small van of printed matter, bundles weighing about 3 or 4 pounds. They stood in line from the curb to the basement door passing the bundles from one to the other. It was amusing as well as disgusting to bear witness to such a sight. These men ought to be out in the fields, at the plow instead of loafing about Federal buildings here in Washington.

Whoever is responsible for these conditions should be called to task for the vicious waste of public funds.

I presume you have learned from observation and otherwise that these conditions are general in the Federal buildings.

It appears that some person in authority in the different divisions has a license to employ a superfluous lot of men and boys at extravagant wages for the simplest kind of work.

Mr. President, I simply call attention at this time to this letter, because the Federal Board for Vocational Education is just beginning organization, and I wish them to understand that there are some Members of the Senate at least who are going to watch carefully if such practices are to be followed.

Mr. THOMAS. Does not the Senator think that his correspondent is guilty of race discrimination?

Mr. SMOOT. It may be that I had better read the whole letter. It continues:

Referring to the first part of this letter I also wish to say that there are white men of all ages who spend a good deal of time loafing about the hallways and alley, smoking, etc., and I conscientiously think it is time to call a halt.

Trusting that you as a member of the Appropriations Committee will give the matter due consideration, I beg to remain,

Very respectfully, yours.

I do not want to encumber the RECORD with the whole of the letter. Of course, the Board for Vocational Education has a lump-sum appropriation and they can do as they please with it and employ as many employees as the lump-sum appropriation will allow.

Mr. THOMAS. That is the trouble.

Mr. SMOOT. That is where the great trouble comes.

I have another letter in relation to the salaries that are being paid, but I do not want to put it in the RECORD, because it mentions particular individuals as receiving certain salaries, until after I find out positively whether the statement is correct or not.

ARTICLE BY BASIL M. MANLY.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "What the Great War has meant to the incomes of some leading American corporations," by Basil M. Manly, joint chairman of the National War Labor Board. I think it is important to have it printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"WHAT THE GREAT WAR HAS MEANT TO THE INCOMES OF SOME LEADING AMERICAN CORPORATIONS.

[By Basil M. Manly, joint chairman National War Labor Board.]

"Every American—man, woman, and child—knows that since our entry into the World War there has been outrageous profiteering in almost every line of commercial activity. But this knowledge is based upon general impressions and upon particular instances rather than upon exact facts representative of the entire field of American industry.

"The American people are in much the same position as the man who knows he has been robbed of a lot of money, but does not know exactly how much he lost or who got away with the swag. It has seemed to me worth while to start a little investigation of my own to find out, in a general way, how much has been taken by profiteering during the war and to secure evidence which will show, at least, who the big profiteers are.

"This has been a somewhat slow and difficult process, because, for some reason, the financial reports of nearly all American corporations have been greatly delayed this year, while some of them have deliberately suppressed their annual reports for the purpose of concealing their unconscionable profits from the public.

"However, as rapidly as these annual reports have been published I have analyzed them and set down their net profits for the war years alongside their net profits for the prewar years. My list now includes complete returns from 82 American corporations, representative of every branch of American industry, with a total capitalization of some ten billion dollars.

"I want to emphasize the fact that the corporations included in this list are not in any sense selected either because their profits were large or because their profits were small. It includes every corporation whose profits were available to me for both the war period and the prewar period. The result may, therefore, be accepted without reserve as representing accurately and fully the facts regarding profiteering by all American industrial corporations.

"TREMENDOUS PROFITS.

"I also want to emphasize that the net incomes shown for 1917 and 1918 are after the deduction of all interest charges and all taxes—income taxes, corporation taxes, excess-profits taxes, and all the other taxes shown in the accounts of the companies—as well as all the extraordinary charges for depreciation, amortization of war facilities, real and fictitious reserves, and every other similar device which these corporations have set up on their books as a means of concealing their profits from the tax collector and the public.

"In other words, the amount of income shown for 1917 and 1918 is less by several hundred million dollars than the actual amount of profits available for the stockholders, either in the form of dividends or in the form of reserves.

"A compilation of these figures shows that the same 82 corporations which in the prewar years had net incomes of $325,000,000 had net incomes in 1916 amounting to more than a billion dollars, in 1917 of $975,000,000, and in 1918 of $736,000,000. The war profits, over and above all taxes, of these corporations in 1917 amounted to $650,000,000.

Average net income for prewar years	$325,797,661
Net income for 1916	1,070,342,983
Net income for 1917	975,573,296
Net income for 1918	736,008,796

"I am convinced as a result of my study, as I will show in detail a little later, that the actual profits, even after the payment of taxes, in 1917 and 1918 were just as great as in 1916, the difference being accounted for by the fact that in 1917 and 1918 a large number of these corporations set up all kinds of excessive reserves for depreciation, amortization, and other unspecified and fanciful items for the obvious purpose of evading taxation and shoving the burden of the war cost to the bent backs of private citizens.

INCREASE OF 200 PER CENT.

"But even taking the figures as they stand, we find that these 82 corporations earned, net, $3 in 1916 and 1917 for every dollar which they earned in prewar years and over $2 in 1918 for every dollar earned in the prewar period. In other words, their net incomes in 1916 and 1917 were 200 per cent greater than in the prewar period, and in 1918 they were 100 per cent greater.

"'But,' the profiteers say, 'this method of comparison is unfair. Patriotically responding to the needs of our country, we did an enormously greater business in 1916, 1917, and 1918 than in the prewar period. Our profits were greater because of the volume of business and not because we exacted extraordinary profits from the public and the Government.'

"This is a direct challenge which must be met. Let's run down the list of companies which show the gross volume of their business and see what the facts are. Here is the Allis-Chalmers Co., for example, which was bankrupt before the war. In 1914, after reorganization, Allis-Chalmers had a deficit of $25,068 on total sales amounting to $10,323,150. In 1915, after the war orders started, the company earned $1,078,352 on total sales of $11,666,413, but in 1918, when its plants were full of American war orders, the Allis-Chalmers Co. earned $9,754,749 on total sales of $35,031,234. In making this compilation I have not, as in the tables, deducted an item for 1918 of $5,128,822, which is thrown in under the blanket heading of 'Fed. etc. tax and conting.'

"In other words, with sales only three times as great as in 1915, the corporation earned in 1918 just nine times as much. In 1915 its profits were a little less than 10 cents on every dollar of sales. In 1918 they were nearly 30 cents on every dollar.

"A word, also, ought to be said about the fact that this apparent increase in business does not represent any proportionate increase in the amount of product which the Nation so grievously needed during the war. The price of metal products at the end of the war was nearly three times as great as at the beginning of the war, which would indicate that the Allis-Chalmers Co. had no great increase in the amount of production, but simply marked up its prices.

"Moving on down the alphabet we find our old friend, the American Ice Co., which in 1915 earned $1,853,415 on total sales of $8,650,428, and in 1918 earned $3,661,627 on total sales of $12,742,433. In this case I have not deducted in either 1915 or 1918 a blanket item of 'Int., taxes, impts., etc.' Charges for improvements obviously have no place as deductions in arriving at net earnings.

"On every dollar's worth of ice which the American Ice Co. sold in 1915 it earned 20 cents, while in 1918 prices were shoved up until 30 cents was earned.

SOME EARNINGS CONCEALED.

"Space will not permit a complete analysis of the many devices adopted by American corporations for the concealment of their war earnings, but a few examples will show the method. Armour & Co., in order to conceal the excessive profits which they made while nominally under Food Administration control, included under the head of 'operating expenses,' taxes, depreciation, and other similar unspecified items. It would be just as legitimate, from an accounting standpoint, to include dividends and surplus under operating expenses. The only purpose which Armour & Co. had in adopting this method of juggling their accounts was to conceal their actual profits from the public.

"The United States Rubber Co. report contains this remarkable statement: 'Net income is here shown * * * after deducting income charges (net) including inventory adjustments and United States, British, and Canadian taxes, $19,289,535 against $7,760,148 in 1917.' The United States Steed Corporation in 1918 has this interesting item: 'Amortization of war facilities, $12,215,000.' Such examples might be multiplied indefinitely.

"It should be noted for the benefit of those who are not familiar with the finances of American industrial corporations that the amounts of income shown in the tables represent the sums available for dividends upon stocks, the majority of which do not represent the investment of a single dollar or which were bought by the interests now in control for nominal sums.

"Housewives, for example, who are paying exorbitant prices for meat may be interested in the facts concerning Wilson & Co., packers (advertising slogan, 'The Wilson label protects your table'), which in 1918 had available for dividends $7,631,535, after the payment of interest and setting aside ample reserves for excess-profits taxes, etc. The bankers (Kuhn, Loeb & Co., Guaranty Trust, Chase National, William Salomon, Hallgarten, Illinois Trust & Savings, and Continental & Commercial Trust & Savings) who, with Thomas E. Wilson, control the common stock of this company, in 1915 bought a controlling interest amounting to a par value of $12,000,000 for $649,000.

"In other words, it cost the bankers and Tom Wilson a little more than 5 cents on the dollar to secure control of this company less than four years ago. The total cost to them for complete control of this company was less than one-eleventh of the net earnings in 1918. In the four years since these interests acquired control of Wilson & Co. it has earned, net, more than thirty times as much as they paid to secure control. This was the deal of which Louis F. Swift, in a letter to his brothers, Edward F. and George H. Swift, wrote: 'Forgot to mention Kuhn-Loeb is in on quiet on bank deal (think it's too much to steal to admit in open!).'

"This is profiteering with a vengeance, and the profiteers may well tremble lest the people avenge themselves for this shameless exploitation during the period of the Nation's greatest necessity."

HIGH COST OF LIVING.

Mr. FLETCHER. I also ask to have printed in the RECORD an article appearing in the Florida Times Union by Dr. W. F. Blackman, president of the State Live Stock Association of Florida, on the jurisdiction of Congress and the high cost of living.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"CONGRESS AND THE HIGH COST OF LIVING.

[By Dr. W. F. Blackman, president of the State Live Stock Association.]

"We are all of us caught in the pinch of high prices and filling the air and the newspapers with our lamentations and objurgations. The cost of living has somewhat more than doubled since the World War began, and the resulting distress is unquestionable and enormous.

"The President and Congress are being urged to intervene, but what precisely can they do to lower the cost of living? I hear no clear answer to this question.

"Before this question can be answered we must know what are the causes of the high cost of living at which we so bitterly complain.

"Doubtless there is profiteering now, as there always has been, and it should be restrained as far as may be; but profiteering is not the chief cause of high prices; on the contrary, it is relatively insignificant.

"There are, I think, two main causes for high prices, namely, (1) an excess of gold and of the various instruments of credit, and (2) a scarcity of goods. The first of these causes can be removed, perhaps, by legislation; the second certainly can not.

"All prices are measured by and expressed in the gold dollar or its equivalents. But the gold dollar has no stable value. To be sure, it always contains 25.8 grains of gold, nine-tenths fine, but its value, its real value, its 'exchange value'—that is to say, its purchasing power—depends, as does that of any other commodity, on its abundance or scarcity.

"What we need is a stable, a standardized, a 'compensated' dollar, just as we already have unchanging standards for the measuring of weights and areas and volumes. And it is possible to provide such a standard of value by the use of the 'index number,' which is an expression of the average and relative prices of all commodities which we buy and sell.

"When gold is abundant and cheap—that is to say, when commodities are dear—let more gold bullion be deposited at the mint in exchange for gold certificates; when gold is scarce and dear—that is to say, when commodities are cheap—let less gold be required in exchange for certificates. Let the balance be constantly redressed in this manner at stated intervals; let the two members of the equation be kept equal. When the single gold standard is replaced by the 'multiple standard,' the commodity standard, prices will tend to be stable, at least in a far greater measure than now.

"The world's supply of gold has enormously increased in recent years, and the price level of commodities has risen correspondingly.

"But the second reason for high prices is the scarcity of goods. The law of supply and demand can no more be evaded, however much we may hate or malign it, than the law of gravitation can be evaded; abundant commodities mean reasonable prices, superabundant commodities mean cheap prices, scarce commodities mean high prices, let Congress do what it may.

"Are commodities scarce? There is no need of ransacking reports and citing statistics for the answer; when 4,000,000 of our most efficient producers have been withdrawn from their work for a considerable period as soldiers; when other millions have been making powder, shells, guns, and other materials and munitions of war which nobody can eat or wear or live in or wants; when vast multitudes of men have been taken from the farm and the factory and set to building camps, cantonments, and superfluous ships; when enormous amounts of goods have been withdrawn from trade and use here and have been sent overseas for the support of our soldiers, our allies, and the neutral countries; when precious material of incalculable cost and value have been burned up and otherwise wasted for years on the battle field there is no need of the statistician to show the plain man that as compared with the piping times of peace the store of commodities for human use in America and in the world has been depleted.

"Well, the demand for these supplies is now inevitably great, above the normal, as compared with the supply, and their price is therefore correspondingly high. This is a fact which the President and Congress are helpless to alter.

"We can perhaps help the matter in some small degree here and there by legislation, but, after all, what we must make up our minds to, as I view the situation, is to 'grin and bear' it as well as we can until conditions adjust themselves once more, production overtakes consumption, and the supply meets the demand.

"The railway employees say that though their wages have been increased the cost of living has increased still more rapidly and they are worse off than before the war. Of course they are. And so are, or ought to be, all of us, every one. If any man, capitalist or laborer, is getting as much to eat and wear or spend on pleasure—if he is getting as large a net income—as he got in 1914, then he is getting more than his fair share, unless he is also producing more and serving the country better than he did in 1914; either he is in luck above his fellows or else he is profiteering unjustly; the average man isn't getting as much as he did, the reason being that there is not as much to be got. While the demand is unabated or increased, the supply is shrunken, the prices are sky-high, the 'net' is diminished, and the lamentations are loud.

"But will the President and Congress have the courage to say this to the trade-unionist, the capitalist who complains at his taxes, and all of us, their clamorous constituents and partisans? Will they dare to advise us to hush our clamor and to sweat more, produce more, save more, sacrifice more, until the gashes cut by murderous and insane war in the body politic and industrial are healed?

"We shall see.

"If we 'keep our head' and are wisely guided, so marvelous are the vitality and recuperative power of America that normal conditions should be restored without much delay and an era of great prosperity open before us."

PRICE OF WHEAT AND FLOUR.

Mr. PITTMAN. I have here a telegram from the Riverside Mill Co., of Reno, Nev., which makes a definite proposition in regard to fixing the price of wheat and also of flour. As it is very short, I ask to have it printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RENO, NEV., August 5, 1919.

Hon. KEY PITTMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

If Congress will prohibit the sale of wheat for more than the Government fixed price and will permit flour mills to add to such wheat cost not more than two and one-half dollars per barrel of flour as a total charge for manufacturing selling containers and everything necessary to put the flour on the market except freight, competition will do the rest, and a good part of the high-cost-of-living question will be solved so far as bread is concerned, and the billion dollars appropriated to take care of any reduced price will not need to be used, as flour at its present price is the cheapest product food there is.

RIVERSIDE MILL CO.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I desire to offer to the Senate for the purpose of having printed in the RECORD two editorials from the Grand Rapids Herald. The editor of that paper is a man noted in Michigan for his intelligence and patriotism. I think these articles are worthy of reading by all Senators, and for that purpose I ask unanimous consent that they be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"THREE FRIENDS DISAGREE.

"Three Senators of the United States mixed in a congressional debate the other day. They were discussing the league of nations. All three of these Senators are Democrats. All three of them are zealous followers of the White House and faithful believers in the doctrine of infallibility. All three, naturally, therefore, are sled-length advocates of unlimited American signature to the league of nations covenant, without reservations, preservations, interpretations, or clarifications. They are riding in the same boat, pulling the same oar, seeking the same port. And yet these three close-harmony crusaders could not agree even among themselves as to what the covenant means or what it intends in relation to an important American right.

"The particular point in issue was the right of withdrawal from the league—and this is a highly serious point, because 'the right of withdrawal' from a governmental union is not a matter safely to be left in any doubt, as we ourselves learned at terrible cost in 1861.

"The covenant pretends to permit withdrawal on two years' notice, providing that all of a nation's 'international obligations and all its obligations under this covenant shall have been fulfilled at the time of its withdrawal' (art. 1, sec. 3). But what does this mean? Does it mean that the United States would be its own judge as to its 'fulfillment of obligations,' and therefore a free agent in this process of withdrawal? Or does it mean that the league could tell us we had not 'fulfilled our obligations,' and thereupon refuse us the right to withdraw? And in this latter circumstance, if we still did withdraw, would we be at war with the world?

"What happened when these three aforesaid senatorial friends of the covenant set out to explain?

"Senator SWANSON, of Virginia, announced that the American right of withdrawal will be absolute and without strings.

"Senator MCKELLAR, of Tennessee, announced that the American right of withdrawal will be subject to a decision of the league council on the state of the 'fulfillment of obligations'—we being excluded from voting on our own case.

"Senator SIMMONS, of North Carolina, announced that the American right of withdrawal will be subject to a decision of the league council—we being permitted a vote on our own case.

"SIMMONS said he was quite sure MCKELLAR was mistaken. MCKELLAR said he was equally sure that SWANSON was mistaken. SWANSON undoubtedly thought both of his fellow sled-lengthers were off the track.

"At any rate, all this happened—between friends—on one page of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. All this happened—between friends—in an endeavor to construe and interpret so vital a proposition as the right of withdrawal (a right so terrible in its challenge that it once cost us four years of civil war). What, pray, would happen if the argument were between the United States and a group of foreign powers which would have no primary interest in our concerns?

"Is it possible that any serious-minded American will persist in saying that we should leave an essentiality like this in such menacing doubt?

"This right of withdrawal is one of the four fundamentals which the Herald insists should be covered by American reservation. And we submit to our readers the proposition that these three senatorial league advocates have conclusively demonstrated the need for this reservation.

"If the covenant means what Senator SWANSON (who is supposed to speak for the President) says it means, well and good. In that event, it is safe for the United States, because we are not irrevocably tied to a superstate which can deny us self-determination. But if it means what MCKELLAR and SIMMONS, in varying degree, say it means, it is a perpetual world yoke around Columbia's neck—locked and the key thrown to Europe's keeping.

"The original draft of the covenant was amended at Paris for the pretended purpose of meeting this situation (in response to American protest) and permitting withdrawal. The fact that an amendment was thus made confessed to the necessity for remedy. But the remedy is a fake if its effect is the result described by either MCKELLAR or SIMMONS (two of its friends).

"An American reservation such as the Herald urges will tell the world officially what SWANSON (and the President) tell the world unofficially. We dare not risk an ultimate international debate in which alien nations, bent upon controlling us against our national will, might McKellarize us or Simmonsize us into perpetual dependence. And surely we but contribute to the structure of true peace when we propose, by American reservation, to remove from this charter for the world's salvation such an invitation to misunderstandings and friction and quarrel—such an invitation to another secession rebellion on an international scale."

"THE BEGINNING OF THE END.

"For several weeks Republican Senators who desire to see the league accepted have been shaping a reservation program designed to further protect national interests without weakening vitally the league covenant. The result of their work is a group of four reservations relating to the powers of Congress to declare war, the Monroe doctrine, national control of domestic problems, and the right of withdrawal. This program is backed by agreement between the following seven Senators: MCCUMBER, North Dakota; MCNARY, Oregon; CUMMINS, Iowa; COLT, Rhode Island; LENROOT, Wisconsin; KELLOGG, Minnesota; and SPENCER, Missouri." (Washington Associated Press dispatch yesterday.)

"In the Herald's judgment, this dispatch marks the beginning of the end of the league of nations fight. These seven Senators have their feet upon the solid ground and their eyes upon realities. In this group, notably, is Senator MCCUMBER. MCCUMBER is the only Republican member of the Foreign Relations Committee who has been openly and consistently standing with the President thus far throughout the league fight. In this group, again, is Senator MCNARY. MCNARY is one of the few other Republicans whom the administration has had hopes of attracting to sled-length acceptance of the league covenant. If MCCUMBER and MCNARY are committed to American reservation (with Mr. Taft likewise acquiescent), we are entering the final stages of this controversy. American reservations will win; and when reservations win, the league wins, too.

"With the profoundest conviction of which men are capable, we believe in these four reservations: First, for the sake of America and her perpetuated constitutional independence; second, for the sake of the league itself and its immunity to ultimate American frictions which would invite American secession and resultant league bankruptcy.

"The average American wants three things in this affair: (1) Peace, made as permanent as artificially possible; (2) a legitimate trial of the league idea; (3) corollary assurance and insurance of unimpaired American independence. Neither the sled-lengther who would defeat the whole treaty nor the sled-lengther who would swallow it all in one trustful gulp can answer this desire of the average American. The reservationist can: (1) Because American reservations will kill for keeps prospective misunderstandings (universally acknowledged to exist) which will inevitably lead to frictions and which are breeders of inevitable trouble subvertive of peace; (2) because American reservations will permit America to whole-heartedly enter the league, without suspicions or misgivings or equivocal intentions, and will thus assure the league greater permanence of American support and correspondingly greater permanence of effective service to the world; (3) because American reservations will remove every doubt as to whether the league is safe for the United States and veto ultimate hostile interpretations (permitted by the text) which would toss away many of the most sacred American rights which 140 years of independence have achieved.

"These are the things for which the Herald has contended for months. They are the things which first seemed to find official expression in a resolution offered by Senator SPENCER, of Missouri, several weeks ago. They are the things which we read into the proclamation of the "group of seven." They are the things which last week's Herald poll showed to be close to the hearts of 75 per cent of a representative Grand Rapids group from whom we sought an unprejudiced expression of opinion. We believe they are the things a dominant majority of all the American people will demand as they move into a broadening understanding of this whole mighty problem.

"The contest is not between sled-lengthers who would defeat the whole league idea and sled-lengthers who would take it completely on faith as a thing infallible. The former class is negligible. The contest is between sled-lengthers who would sign the dotted line without limitation and reservationists who believe in the league after the league has been made safe for the United States.

"Unless appearances deceive, the White House itself will ultimately consent to reservations. The way is being paved. A United Press dispatch yesterday said presidential advisers are already at work upon 'innocuous' reservations. If this adjective is used in its literal sense—meaning 'free from harm'—the reservations in which the Herald believes are 'innocuous.' But if it is used in its colloquial sense—meaning practically meaningless—essential American reservations are not 'innocuous.' The demand for reservations is no hypocritical camouflage; and any effort to treat it as such will be futile. American independence is not 'innocuous,' in this latter sense; neither is a crusade to preserve it."

DEMANDS OF RAILWAY TRAINMEN AND RACE RIOTS.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, since the 5th of August I have been in receipt of a large number of letters and telegrams referring to some remarks which I submitted to the Senate on that date. A typical letter of the number thus received is one from Rev. John S. Plumer, some parts of which I have stricken out, and I ask that it be published in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

192 BELL AVENUE, PITTSBURGH, PA.,
August 6, 1919.

The Hon. Mr. THOMAS,
United States Senator from Colorado,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR THOMAS: I lament my ignorance of your full name that I might have headed my note to you with a more suitable address.

This defect, however, does not detract in the least from the sincerity and earnestness of what I now endeavor to write.

The morning papers of this city give a brief outline or report of some remarks you made August 5 in the Senate concerning the railroad situation created by the recent proposals and demands of the railway operators. I desire to express my profound gratitude that at least one strong, clear protest and rebuke has been uttered in a place of authority against the demands of the railway unions and, indeed, against the spirit of labor generally now prevailing in this country. I am myself the son of a working man, and I am not in the capitalist class, but for many years my life work has kept me in close touch with the people, and I know almost as well as one man can know, the spirit that is now moving among the people. The people are shot through with unsound economic theories. They are fast being Bolshevized and Socialized. I come in contact with ignorant workingmen who profess themselves Bolshevists, and in almost any group of workingmen of the city one can hear prophecies of something "about to drop" and much clatter of a like kind. Besides the idea of economizing seems not to enter the heads especially of those who are receiving high wages, as almost every kind of labor in the Pittsburgh district is. They want their "flivvers," the table must be supplied with the choicest cuts of meat, with roasts, with chicken, and everywhere I go among employers of labor I hear complaints of inefficiency, of slacking, and of a degree of sullenness that makes it difficult for the employers to be on decent terms with their men. Multitudes of the rest of us economize, we cut expenditures in every possible direction; we recognize the hard conditions imposed by the war, but the laboring man, the manual worker, seems to have imbibed the notion that he is a privileged character whose demands must be honored at sight. I need not particularize conditions here in Pittsburgh, but they are not reassuring. Our newspapers play safe and seem incapable of uttering counsels of moderation. And our public men seem many of them willing to capitalize the unreasoning discontent of the masses to partisan advantage. With you, I believe the industrial situation is the paramount issue for the American people. * * * With the domineering attitude of the unions, this is fast ceasing to be a free country or a tolerable land to live in. We who are homeless find it impossible to put even a modest roof over our heads when we come to deal with the stone mason, the bricklayer, the carpenter, the painter, and last but not least lordly, the plumber. "If you don't want to pay our price you can do without." For 40 years I have worked hard and lived frugally in the hope of being able in my old age to shove into some port, but now I find I have to deal with men who seem absolutely to have but one aim in view and that is to get as much with as little return as possible. If these fellows would only do an honest day's work we could stand their wages, but the country over labor is abstracting at this hour more from the fund of public wealth than labor is replacing, and in fact, overdrawing what we may call the bank account, and with the inevitable result already in sight.

I pray the man may arise or the party that, while not antagonizing labor, a thing nobody intends, will at the same time accept the issue as presented by the railway men, and, if necessary, will have a showdown at the polls as to whether this country is to be run in the interests of this class or that, and whether our lawmakers must bow to every mandate that may come up from those who imagine they are the only people in the land, and that they must be obeyed or they will proceed to upset things generally. * * *

I hope I have not trespassed on your time and patience by this long, and I fear not very coherent, letter. I have striven without forethought to express feelings that I believe are in the heart of multitudes of our people who merely await a leader to rally for the defense of our institutions and an ordered liberty. * * *

Respectfully, yours,

REV. JOHN S. PLUMER.

LETTER FROM MASSACHUSETTS DEMOCRATIC CLUB HEAD.

Mr. MOSES. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter written by the president of the Democratic Club of the State of Massachusetts to the chairman of the Democratic national committee.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"WANT WILSON REPUDIATED—DEMOCRATIC CLUB HEAD CALLS FOR PARTY CENSURE—STATE SENATORS AND REPRESENTATIVES INDORSE—HIT THE PRESIDENT ON 14 POINTS OF FAULT—SAY HE WRECKED PARTY AFTER IT MADE HIM.

"Francis J. Finneran, president of the Democratic Club of Massachusetts, has forwarded to Homer Cummings, chairman of the Democratic national committee, a letter signed by himself and 2 State senators and 15 representatives, demanding that the national committee repudiate the actions of President Wilson. In their letter the Democrats say:

"'We, the undersigned Democrats of Massachusetts, request to call a meeting of the northern and western members of the national committee and repudiate the actions of Woodrow Wilson, who wrecked the party after we had lifted him from obscurity, making him a governor and then President.

"'He has held the party up to ridicule by the following acts:

"'First. By appointing incompetent men to positions of responsibility, the most glaring examples of which are Postmaster General Burleson, Secretary of War Baker, and Fuel Administrator Garfield.

"'Second. By leaving the country at a time when the great problems of reconstruction and the high cost of living confronted Congress, camouflaging through Europe and causing us to lose the friendship of Italy and other countries by his actions.

"'Third. By attempting to force an English covenant, called the league of nations, upon the American people at the cost of the destruction of the Declaration of Independence, of tolerating the larceny of Shantung from China by Japan, and the robbery of India and Egypt by Great Britain.

"'Fourth. By his idle promises at Washington's tomb, when he declared he would demand the independence of small nations, and by refusing to take up the question at the peace table of the liberty of Egypt, India, Ireland, and South Africa, and recognizing England's right to govern Egypt.

"'Fifth. By his advocating internationalism, which means the loss of the national spirit of patriotism and the birth of socialism.

"'Sixth. By placing American troops in Russia, a country against which Congress has not declared war, and his attempt to kill the spirit of America for only Americans.

"'Seventh. By his policy in Mexico, his recognition of Carranza, an anarchist and anti-American, and the toleration of the murder of over 300 Americans in Mexico without a declaration of war.

"'Eighth. By his refusing the request of both branches of Congress that he take up the Irish question at the peace table.

"'Ninth. By his partisanship toward the South at the cost of the rest of the country.

"'Tenth. By his signing of the war-time prohibition act after the armistice was signed.

"'Eleventh. By his policy of rehabilitation of bankrupt European nations at the expense of the impoverishment of the American Government.

"'Twelfth. By his disregard of the Baltimore platform, which pledged him to aid the passage of the Panama Canal free tolls.

"'Thirteenth. By his disregard of the right of suffrage, which belongs to hundreds of thousands of negroes of the South.

"'Fourteenth. By his policy of shipping vast amounts of foods to Europe and spending $100,000,000 for food at the expense of America, thus causing the present high cost of living which confronts the American people.

"'Hoping immediate action will be taken so that we can build up our party anew and let the people forget that he ever was a member of our party and make it possible for us to elect a northern or western Democratic President in 1920, we are:

"'Francis J. Finneran, president Democratic Club of Massachusetts; Senators George E. Curran and William J. Foley, and Representatives Thomas F. Donovan, Thomas H. Green, Dennis F. Reardon, James J. HIGH COST OF LIVING.

Mr. CAPPER. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter to the editor of the Washington Post from T. C. Atkeson, Washington representative of the National Grange, headed "Less work, less food." It bears upon the subject of the high cost of living, which is now engrossing the attention of the country, and as it is important I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LESS WORK, LESS FOOD—TOO MANY PEOPLE IDLING, CAUSE OF HIGH PRICES, WRITER SAYS—FARMER CAN NOT PROFITEER—IN SELLING PRODUCE, HE COMPETES WITH EVERY OTHER FARMER—PUTS $5 OF LABOR INTO $2 WHEAT, BECAUSE LABORERS PREFER NOT TO HARVEST—LIFTING OF RESTRICTIONS URGED.

"To the EDITOR OF THE POST:

"In view of the remarkably significant developments of the last few days indicating the nearness to the breaking point in this country in the conflict between the cost of living and the upward trend of wage demands, it has seemed to us that at least a brief attention should be centered in the producers of the foods, the American farmers.

"I have read with interest your editorial on 'The food problem' in the Washington Post, Saturday, and also noted the significance of the other two editorials in the same issue, 'The ungrateful Mr. Mackey,' in which you show how the relinquishment of Government control is immediately followed by a reduction by 20 per cent in telegraph rates; and the 'Too many loafers,' in which you say 'There is plenty of work for every man who can work,' a statement which goes more deeply to the root of the entire question of the high cost of living than any other single sentence in your remarkably able editorial page. This, at least, is the view of the farmers as interpreted by the National Grange.

NOT TO BLAME FOR HIGH PRICES.

"We take it, from the conclusion of your editorial, that you do not, when thinking seriously and earnestly, place the burden of the cause of high food prices on the farmer. In no item of price quoted in your editorial did you name a price or express an opinion that indicated the price to the producer was exorbitant.

"In this you are right. It is a practical impossibility for the farmer to profiteer. He grows his produce in competition with every other farmer, puts it on the market at whatever price anyone else will pay for it, and buys his labor and materials in the open market at the seller's figure. He raises his crop under these terms, after gambling with the weather, with drought and flood and frost, and with every insect pest and plant disease known to the mind of man. It is impossible that the farmer can profiteer.

1,100 PER CENT PROFIT.

"Your editorial mentioned as the outstanding examples of what you term profiteering, meat, the onion, potatoes, and flour. Why did you omit the still more outstanding items of cotton cloth, woolen cloth, and shoes? I have seen it stated that the gingham which to-day costs 60 cents a yard contains but 5 cents' worth of cotton. Now, why should I be compelled to pay 60 cents, or 1,100 per cent profit, for 5 cents' worth of cotton?

"Why not mention watch springs, in which the spring which costs you a dollar and a half installed in your watch contains but a fraction of a cent's worth of iron. Of course, the answer to each item is that after the raw product, whether iron in the ground or the potatoes in the farmer's field, is in the possession of its first owner before it reaches the ultimate consumer it has had labor performed on it.

MUST DO PRODUCTIVE WORK.

"If the Government can discover a way to take labor out of growing crops or out of marketing crops, then the price may be lowered. If the Government can discover a way to make 8 hours' labor produce as much work as 10 or 12 hours' labor formerly did, then you can reduce the cost of living.

"If the Government can discover what proportion of the labor in the country is employed at work which is nonproductive, and then set that labor at productive work, it might cause sufficient competition in labor as to reduce the cost of essential products, and hence affect the cost of living. If, as very ably pointed out in the Post, there were not so many loafers, it might help some.

"I wish to commend this quotation from the tiger of France, Clemenceau, whose iron will and clear brain kept France and her Allies to the task until they won: 'You must not think that peace is a contract which ends all difficulties. No country escapes the law of work.'

WANT DAYLIGHT LAW REMOVED.

"Now, let me make plain the position the farmer takes in all of this. We want daylight saving removed so that the last hour in the afternoon can be spent in farm work. We want no price fixing, and have never wanted price fixing. Wheat prices were fixed to keep prices down, and we acquiesced through patriotic motives. Then there was a proclamation fixing the wheat price again, and this contract with but one party to it has been ratified and is being carried out. But we are putting $5 labor on $2 wheat.

"If any seriously minded part of the public thinks this Government price is keeping the price of wheat up, we will here and now enter into a contract to enter no opposition to removing this guaranty, provided all other restrictions are removed to permit the American farmer to sell his wheat in the markets of the world.

CROP OUTLOOK REDUCED.

"It will soon be evident in whose interest this guaranty works. The revised figures of the crop-reporting board show material decline in the crop outlook. Wheat in Virginia and Maryland has been seriously damaged by recent rains. Illinois reports indicate hardly a bushel of No. 1 wheat in the State. It is my judgment that when the thrashing machine tells the real story and the estimates are replaced by actualities, there will be a shrinkage of from 20 to 25 per cent in the figures—an 800,000,000 or 900,000,000 bushel instead of a billion and a quarter.

"The proposition for the Government to buy the wheat at the $2.26 price, to satisfy the farmer, and then sell it to the consumer, say, at $1.50 a bushel, is socialism gone to seed. If the Government wishes to do this, and charge the cost to the taxpayer, why not go the rest of the way and supply the biscuits free and charge the whole cost to the taxpayer?

GROWS WHEAT FOR REVENUE.

"One policy is as sound as the other. Only let us remind you that if this is done, and $2.26 remains a fixed price for wheat, the American farmer will grow it or not, just as the revenue which it brings him causes him to think it is best for him, and if he happens to stop growing wheat some one will be hungry. There will be no biscuit. If the world market is permitted to fix the price of wheat, the American farmer will continue to grow it to feed himself and the world.

"There was a fixed price on pork, at 17 cents. It was removed by the Food Administration in response to a clamor for cheaper pork. Now we have the result of a double reaction. Hogs are scarce, because the fixed price was so low that farmers would not produce heavily, and because hogs are scarce and the market eager pork has gone from 17 to 23½ cents, a world record high price, and bids fair, for a time at least, to stay around that high mark.

HIGHER PRICES, MORE PRODUCTION.

"This high price means increased production, and there will be both pork and probably lower prices soon. Pork is quickly produced. If the 17-cent price had been maintained, it is fair to assume that soon there would have been no pork at any price. That is not the way to save a starving world.

"The utter futility and foolishness of trying through governmental agencies to prevent high prices is ludicrous if it were not tragic. The Government may be able to find and pinch profiteers. Good, go to it; especially to the rent profiteers in every large city.

"But there is only one way to reduce the cost of living, and that can not be done by a government. That is to follow Clemenceau's suggestion—'go to work.'

"The Springfield Republican hits the nail on the head: 'When the 44-hour week goes into effect on the farm some one will have to discover a substitute for eats.'

WORK CURE FOR BOLSHEVISM.

"The farmer's work is no more involved in the price of the bread and the potatoes and the meat and the sugar on your table than the work of the road builder, the track walker, the engineer, the trainman, and the teamster or the grocery clerk. When the 44-hour week goes into effect in any trade which deals with getting food from the farm to the dinner table, 'then some one must hunt a substitute for eats.' The solution of the high cost of living and the curse of Bolshevism is found in just one sentence: 'Quit howling and go to work.'

"If a few of the 'investigators' were set at harvesting wheat or digging potatoes, the price of potatoes and flour might might come down.

ITALY'S LOSSES IN THE WAR.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I have just received the following letter addressed to me here:

NEW YORK, August 6, 1919.

Hon. Senator RANSDELL,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: Permit me to address you this letter in reference to your speech of July 31 before the Senate.

You quoted a statistical summary of the battle deaths in armies engaged in the Great War by Col. Leonard P. Ayres, General Staff, Chief Statistics Branch, in which Italy's figures are calculated at 330,000.

For quite some time there has been a tendency here in America to minimize by far the wonderful contribution of Italy toward the successful termination of the past great conflict. Even the American official statistics continue to be inexact.

You would indeed perform an act of loyalty by causing to be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the information and figures inclosed in this letter, the figures being absolutely official in regards to Italy's losses during the war.

With the utmost respect and esteem, I remain.

Respectfully, yours, AGOSTINO DE BIASI,
Editor.

He is the editor of the Italian Review, published in New York. The accompanying table is very brief, and I ask that it be printed along with the letter.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Italy's losses in the war.

[Communication by Agostino de Biasi, editor of the Italian Review Il Carroccio, New York. Figures given by the Italian general staff.]

Dead (of which 16,382 were officers)	460,000
Wounded (of which 33,382 were officers)	947,000
Prisoners (dead)	34,000
Navy's losses (dead)	3,169
Total dead	497,169
On other fronts:
Dead	7,384
Wounded	15,196
In France of which there were:
Dead	4,375
Wounded	6,359
Invalided because of wound and diseases	570,000
Total wounded	947,000

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. LODGE. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

VENIZELOS'S VIEW OF LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have here a short article as to the attitude of the commissioner from Greece, ex-President Venizelos, which I ask the Secretary to read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

VENIZELOS'S CHANGED VIEWS ON LEAGUE VALUE DISCUSSED—AMERICANS AT CONFERENCE FAVORED BULGARS AT EXPENSE OF GREECE, SIMONDS ASSERTS—THRACIAN QUESTION SEEN AS CRUX.

[By Frank H. Simonds.]

"The announcement in Paris dispatches that, as a consequence of the failure of the peace conference to decide Balkan matters, and particularly in view of the American position with reference to the disposition of Thrace, Venizelos has publicly stated his loss of confidence in the league of nations is of more than passing importance at this time. I remember sitting beside the Greek premier at a dinner early in the peace conference when, both at table and in a speech which he made afterwards, he forcefully and eloquently defended the league of nations from the point of view of the representative of a small nation. Venizelos himself was not only a most conspicuous representative of a small nation but he was one of the great figures at Paris, a man whose force and whose intelligence marked him from the outset.

"Had Venizelos sided with the Germans in the war, Greece would have been totally lost to the Allies, would have become an invaluable base for German submarines, and the victorious Macedonian campaign in September of last year could not have occurred. In the face of the open sympathy of King Constantine, the court, and Greek Army with the Kaiser, Venizelos saved Greece to the Allies and rendered service of almost incalculable value at critical hours.

CHAMPIONED LEAGUE AT FIRST.

"In Paris, as in the various peace conferences after the several Balkan wars, Venizelos displayed a moderation and a reasonableness in striking contrast to the attitude of representatives of other small but ambitious nations. From the very outset he was a champion, and a powerful champion, of the league of nations, not only as an ideal but also as a practical machine calculated to protect small powers in the presence of the great; not only as an instrument for peace between large nations but as a guarantee of the independence and rights of little States like his own.

"In the peace conference Venizelos asked for his country only lands in which the population was Greek—lands which had a Hellenic tradition—but in advocating these demands he encountered the hostility of the Italians, and he found himself not alone opposed by the Italians in the Aegean and in northern Epirus, but, to his surprise, he found the United States advocating the bestowal of territories upon the Bulgarians as well as the Albanians, in which the population was Greek, and in which during a brief occupation the Bulgars and the Albanians had persecuted the Greek population as the Bulgars had also persecuted the Serbs during the time they held Serbia.

"The crux of the situation was the disposition of Thrace, and particularly that portion of Thrace which lies between the Maritza River and the present Greek frontier. The occupation of this country had permitted the Bulgars to assail Greece in the second Balkan war without provocation and have a valuable base for Bulgar operations during the World War. In Bulgarian hands it was a constant menace to Saloniki.

"The arguments that this territory should go to Bulgaria rest solely on the fact that without it Bulgaria will have no outlet upon the Aegean; but the country is destitute of harbors, and unless the Bulgars are again to be presented with the Greek city of Kavala it is difficult to see how much importance attaches to this strip of sea front.

"Great Britain and France have agreed in recognizing Venizelos's demand, based alike upon the fact that the population of the territory involved is Greek, not Bulgar, and upon the further fact that in Bulgarian hands it is a constant threat to Greek security.

"Twice in two years Bulgaria attacked her neighbors in undisguised efforts to seize their territory. She is the disturbing element in the Balkans, and her ambition was and remains to acquire an actual hegemony south of the Danube.

AMERICANS AND GREEKS.

"American championship of the Bulgars has been as severe a blow to the Greeks as American championship of the Jugo-Slavs was to the Italians. Moreover, the Italians, themselves rivals of the Greeks and seeking to deprive Greece of lands unquestionably hers under Mr. Wilson's principles, have very promptly and cleverly come to the support of the Bulgarian claims, precisely as they are championing Roumanian demands at the expense of the Serbians.

"Venizelos asks, not without reason, why America, which did not declare war upon Bulgaria and which has no interest at stake, now insists upon the bestowal upon Bulgaria, the hereditary enemy of the Greeks, of lands alike Hellenic and essential to Greek security.

"The idea that the league of nations should advocate the destruction of Greek safety and the annulling of Greek rights has evidently converted Venizelos from the views which he held when I talked with him five months ago. His renunciation of support of the league of nations deprives it of a champion of incalculable value, since in the Paris conference and in the world Venizelos is one of the outstanding figures—a great man in every sense of the word.

"The championship of the Bulgars by America seems to me one of the greatest mistakes conceivable. The Bulgar has represented the Prussian idea and the Prussian spirit in the Balkans. He has been guilty of every crime which we charge against the Germans. A greater Bulgaria would be only a step toward that Bulgaria which the people of this Tartar State have sought to create for more than a generation. The Serbians and the Greeks certainly far more deserve American support, if we are to mix into this complicated question. Moreover, precisely as the effect of our intervention at Fiume has been to break the relations between Italy and her European allies and start her on the road back to her German alliance, the consequences of a successful championship of the Bulgars in Thrace will be to ruin Venizelos in Greece and bring back the supporters of King Constantine and the sympathizers with Germany.

DIFFICULTIES OF LEAGUE.

"This Thracian episode is only one more example of the difficulties which are confronting the still unorganized league of nations in every part of Europe, and one more evidence of how dangerous American participation in the settlement of such questions must be for European nations whose own security and rights are thus sacrificed in the pursuit of an abstract or academic idea.

"If the Bulgars get Thrace there will be another Balkan war provoked by them in an effort to get Saloniki. Conceivably, if they fail to get Thrace there will be another war, but short of handing over the whole Balkan Peninsula to the Bulgars there is no way of satisfying their appetite and their ambition. Venizelos, in 1913, offered them Kavala and all the hinterland east of the Struma. They took it and then attacked Greece treacherously. He and the Serbs consented that they should have this very Thracian region now under discussion even after their wicked assault upon Greece and Serbia in 1913. Yet two years later they attacked Serbia and invaded Greece. The consequence has been that those strong British forces which from the day of Gladstone have sympathized with Bulgaria have practically abandoned hope. Our appearance now in the rôle of a champion of the Bulgars has resulted in the loss not merely of Greek sympathy with the league of nations but of the enormously valuable support of a man who in many eyes bulks as the greatest of contemporary European statesmen."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, because of several declarations made by the President, such as that a new day has dawned, that no longer are nations jealous of each other but are all living together in the spirit of brotherhood, I wanted that article to go into the RECORD. It shows that the Balkans are still aflame; it shows that Italy and Jugo-Slavonia are at swords' points; it shows that every time we attempt to mix in, to "butt in," in an effort to settle the boundaries of Europe, which are none of our business, we get into trouble and make enemies for America. When the war ended every nation in Europe, except Germany, was our friend. Now, I should like to have anybody point out the nation in Europe that is friendly to America, owing to our intermeddling and our attempt to heal the sore spots and festering spots of Europe.

This gentleman, Venizelos, the ex-premier of Greece, President Wilson told us at the White House last March, when we were there with the Foreign Relations Committee, was the ablest man that he had met in Europe. Evidently he has found his way out of the regions of Utopia and has got down to "brass tacks," and whatever adherence he may have given to the delusions and hallucinations which animated at least one of the distinguished members of the peace commission abroad, which, owing to our Treasury and man power, was imposed upon the others, he at least has returned to the earth and to sanity; and I think others will soon follow in his footsteps.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I listened to the reading of that article with great interest. When I heard the President make the statement which the Senator from Connecticut has quoted, I was very much struck with it and not surprised. I have no doubt that Venizelos is one of the very ablest men in Europe to-day, if not the ablest, and of his moderation and wisdom I have heard from many who have attended the peace conference.

Mr. President, there is something in the article that is to me unpleasant, because it refers to the American position in regard to Thrace. I do not know who was at liberty to state the American position, but I do not believe that any Americans in this country who understand the question at all believe in handing Thrace over to Bulgaria. Thrace has a Greek population; they are Hellenic; they ought to be joined to Greece; and it has seemed to me—for the question has been brought to my attention by citizens of Greek origin in this country—that to hand Thrace over to Bulgaria, our enemy, the ally of Germany, to reward her for her opposition to us or to the Allies, for she was fighting on the side of Germany—I say that under these circumstances to take a Greek people and hand them over to Bulgaria seems to me a great wrong. I have thought so for some time and I have looked into the question with some care.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That would seem to me consistent, however, in view of what is called the American attitude toward the Italians in Fiume, handing them over to the Jugo-Slavs, and handing the Chinese in Shantung over to the Japanese.

Mr. LODGE. Yes, Mr. President; but I have been unable to believe that Thrace was to be added to that catalogue. It seems to me incredible that those Greek people should be handed over for the sake of benefiting Bulgaria; and although we can do nothing about it here except to protest, I am very glad that this matter has been brought to the attention of the Senate and to the attention of the country by printing in the RECORD the statement of Mr. Simonds, who is well known as one of the very ablest writers for the press.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the article just read into the RECORD was published in the Evening Star yesterday afternoon, and I read it, I presume, with quite as much interest as did the Senator from Connecticut. I read also another article in the same paper, from a writer whose name I forget, which assumed to give the facts underlying the comments of Mr. Simonds. The Senator from Connecticut has very kindly furnished me a copy of it, and I will read it into the RECORD, because I think the two should go to the public together. This article is by Paul Scott Mowrer, "by cable to the Star and Chicago Daily News," and dated Paris, August 6:

The result of several weeks of private negotiations between Foreign Minister Tittoni, of Italy, and Premier Venizelos, of Greece, is an agreement between Italy and Greece which is of great interest to the United States. In Asia Minor, Italy promises under certain minor restrictions to give Greece the 12 Greek inhabited islands which she took from Turkey in the course of the Tripolitan War. Italy agrees to recognize the Greek claims in Asia Minor despite the pact of St. Jean de Maurienna, which promises Smyrna to Italy. Greece agrees to accept the river meander as a permanent line of demarcation between the Greek and Italian districts.

The Senate will note that this seems to be a side agreement between two of the parties to the Paris conference.

In Albania, Italy agrees to recognize the Greek claim to the northern Epirus; that is to say, to southern Albania. Greece agrees to recognize the Italian claim to Valona and a protectorate over what is left of Albania. In Thrace, Italy agrees to recognize the validity of the Greek claim to all of Thrace, thus cutting off Bulgaria from the Aegean Sea.

These private agreements must first be accepted by the peace conference, but the fact that they have been reached between the States chiefly concerned is a long step toward their definite realization.

HOW UNITED STATES IS INTERESTED.

Where the interest of the United States comes in is chiefly in Thrace. It was Col. Castoldi, of the Italian peace delegation, who has lived many years in the Balkans and knows Balkan questions thoroughly, who first won over our delegation to the conviction that Thrace should remain Bulgarian, despite the political support given by France and Britain to the Greek claims. After a due analysis of the various sets of "propaganda" statistics, it is apparent even to persons unfamiliar with the Balkans that, even aside from Bulgaria's right to an outlet on the Aegean, the parts of Thrace concerned are predominantly Bulgarian. Now that Italy has agreed to change sides and recognize the Greek claims, the American delegates find themselves isolated in opposing the Greek demand for Thrace.

M. Venizelos evidently hopes that the Americans, being now in an absolute minority, will weaken, and indeed there are certain indications to confirm his view. It is entirely possible that neither Under Secretary Polk, who is a newcomer in the field of European diplomatic intrigue, nor Delegate White will fully grasp the meaning of Tittoni's maneuver.

I am convinced that this Italian diplomat, in changing sides and agreeing to support Greece in Thrace, merely did so to facilitate Greco-Italian understandings in other regions. He doubtless counted on the Americans to hold firmly to what they believed the right in the Thracian question. If our delegates give in on the question of right merely because they appear to be in the minority, Tittoni probably will be considerably disconcerted and may even try to work out some entirely new combination before the question is finally decided.

The Tittonian policy is entirely different from that of his predecessor, Baron Sonnino, who fought bitterly over every point and tried to bluster it through.

ITALY DEPENDENT ON ALLIES.

The truth about Italy is that she is absolutely dependent at the present time on the Allies, especially the United States and Britain, for food for her people and coal for her industries. She is accordingly constrained to accept all of the Allies' decisions. Tittoni, therefore, dropped the troublesome Fiume question for the present, and behind a sort of smoke screen of discreetly optimistic press propaganda is pushing forward every question concerning Italy and at the same time jockeying for position at every possible point. Under existing circumstances this would certainly seem to be Italy's best method. The entire Italian policy is dominated by distrust of the new Jugo-Slav State. It is, therefore, apparent that it is to Italy's interest to detach Greece from the Jugo-Slav alliance, if possible, and also to make friends with Bulgaria and Roumania, thus preventing the formation of a Balkan block which would endanger her penetration of Albania. The understanding with Greece is the first step in this direction, but unless Italy is to lose Bulgarian friendship it is essential to Tittoni's strategy that the United States should hold out against Greece in the question of Thrace.

As for Roumania, the fact that the Roumanians have entered Budapest and may prove reluctant to leave gives Italy an opportunity to gain Roumania's friendship by supporting the Roumanian claims in Hungary and gain Bulgaria's good will by asking the Roumanians to give back the Dobrogea to Bulgaria by way of compensation.

MERE FEATURE OF WORLD POLITICS.

All this seems sordid enough, but in the present state of world politics as practiced by the European powers and as tacitly connived at by our own delegates, it is not surprising. Ideally, everything should perhaps be otherwise. Ideally, Italy should be given Fiume, but should be refused Albania and should be kept out of Asia Minor. Ideally, Greece's true field of expansion lies not in southern Albania and Thrace but in Asia Minor, where large sections of the coast are really inhabited by Greeks. Ideally, Bulgaria should not only have Thrace and the Dobrogea but should be given that part of Macedonia which the Serbs and Greeks seized at her expense at the end of the second Balkan war. Ideally, Roumania should be satisfied with Transylvania and probably Bessarabia.

But we are not yet living in an ideal world. If the Americans give in on the question of Thrace, it will be difficult to find a single point in which the proposed Balkan settlements resemble anything like an ideal.

This article throws much light upon the situation, assuming that the recitals of Mr. Mowrer are accurate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me a word of explanation here?

Mr. THOMAS. Why, certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I brought that article over, as the Senator will see, marked with a blue pencil, intending to put it in the RECORD; but after looking it over again, although it is an extremely interesting article and I am glad the Senator put it in, I did not put it in in connection with the other because the other article treats of the question of America taking sides with Bulgaria against Greece. This is a more general résumé of the tangled skein of ensnarlments with which we are dealing, and it did not seem to me to touch the point I wanted to make; so I did not want to stuff the RECORD with it.

Mr. THOMAS. I was not criticizing the Senator for not using it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I know the Senator was not; but I did not want the Senate to think that I had put in one article and withheld another that did not bear out the first article. That was not my purpose at all. I withheld it because it did not seem to me to touch the question of our taking sides with Bulgaria against Greece, but did cover a wider field. I am glad it is in the RECORD.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr President, it would seem, from a cursory examination of the facts, that the position of the United States as regards Fiume and Bulgaria is a consistent one. It has been consistent with Venizelos as to Fiume and consistent with Italy as to Bulgaria; but in the meantime it would seem—to use a common expression—that Italy and Greece have been playing both ends against the middle and carrying on a quiet negotiation of their own by which, through a division of territory as between themselves, each can be satisfied or, at least, each can be made content for the present with the division, provided the peace congress shall accept and confirm their partition of the Balkans and of some parts of Asia Minor.

I regret as much as the Senator from Connecticut possibly can the identification of the United States with these squabbles. I realize as fully as he does that we can make no boundary settlement in the Balkans or in central Europe that will make for the peace of the world unless the settlement, when finally determined, be confirmed and continued by an armed military force constantly on call and ready for action whenever the need arises. But we should have foreseen these things, if we object to them, when we went into the war, because by going into the war, by participating as a combatant by sending our soldiers to Europe and there fighting the allied battles, we entered the European arena. We are there, we can not help ourselves, and we must stay there until the situation clears up by some treaty finally determining these various problems.

If we were to adopt the pending treaty without the league of nations provision we would still be in Europe, because the other parts of the treaty require our participation, as I now remember, in 19 different commissions and boards, some of which are endowed with governmental authority, judicial, legislative, and executive, pending the determination of boundaries and the holding of plebiscites. We are also bound by the treaty, outside of the league of nations, to hold with the Allies all territory to the west of the Rhine with a military force until Germany shall have complied with the major conditions imposed upon her by it; so, being there, we must make the most of it and do the best we can.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator must not assume that the treaty is in existence yet as far as we are concerned. It is perfectly possible for us to strike ourselves out of these commissions and let Europe settle its own affairs.

Mr. THOMAS. I must assume that some treaty will be made at some time between the allied and associated powers and Germany. That is inevitable, because not otherwise can the war be brought to a final, official, actual termination.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Why, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, of course, probably some treaty of peace with Germany will be made at some time. If no treaty of peace with Germany at all is made, a mere declaration of Congress that the state of war which Congress declared no longer exists ipso facto and automatically puts us at peace with Germany. All this attempt to ring us into permanent commissions for the next 50 years, to adjust all the rows of Europe, is simply a scheme to entwine us, in addition to the way the covenant for the league entwines us, in the interminable quarrels of European nations. There is no reason for it. We can have peace with Germany in two days, if we want peace; but the proponents of the league say: "You shall not have peace unless you take the covenant of the league." They are the parties who are delaying peace, not we.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I do not care to indulge in a controversy with regard to the power of Congress to declare peace beyond saying that I do not assent for one moment to that proposition. Congress has no such power.

If we possessed it, Mr. President, the declaration of it would not settle conditions between the United States and Germany.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I understand that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] is a member of the Foreign Relations Committee and that a resolution to the effect that we are at peace with Germany has been referred to that committee for its consideration. I should like to inquire of the Senator whether there is any probability that that resolution will be reported to the Senate for its action?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I can not inform the Senator about the probabilities. Mr. President, peace is a status. Peace is a fact. Everybody knows that we are at peace with Germany now in fact. The position of this Government, having declared war on Germany, remains. That is a technical thing between the two Governments. We declared war against the German Government, as the President said, and not against the German people. Germany never declared war against us. The fighting has stopped. There is no way for us to get at Germany if we wanted to fight without crossing a peaceful country—France. Peace is a status, and everybody in the world knows that we are at peace. The blockade is lifted; we are shipping cargoes to Germany now, and the question is, Shall this Government decline to declare the fact in order to force through a covenant for a league to entangle us with the ensnarlments of Europe forever? That is the question.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, whether Congress has the right to declare peace, and by that means to terminate the war, and whether our declaration would be accepted by a country with which we were at war, are academic questions for the present. Commercial relations have been reestablished between certain of the allied and associated powers and Germany; actual warfare no longer exists; but we have thousands upon thousands of the forces of the allied and associated powers upon German soil keeping peace, which without their presence would in all probability soon be terminated.

However, let me refer again to this article for a moment. I think the details of the proceedings of the peace conference, when given to the world, will disclose a selfishness and a sordid interest of many of the nations there represented that will go far toward confirming the proposition that human nature in all its details is practically the same that it was in 1815 or at any other period in history.

Italy made a bargain, and drove the best bargain she could, with the Allies, while carrying on negotiations for a bargain with Austria and Germany, before she entered into the war. We all know that. It is history. The Allies having made the best proposal, Italy accepted it and threw the weight of her armies and her influence against the Central Powers.

The agreement which was ultimately concluded between her and Great Britain, France, and Russia made no mention whatever of Fiume, but Italy demands Fiume now, notwithstanding that fact. The treaty had nothing to do, I think, so far as territorial acquisition was concerned, with what was then included within the geographical boundaries of the Kingdom of Bulgaria.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, what the Senator from Colorado says with reference to the agreement which brought an end to the war is quite true; but was there not another secret agreement by which Fiume was to pass into the possession of the Serbo-Croatian-Slovenian State?

Mr. THOMAS. This is the first time I have heard of it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, of course there is such an agreement. The President stated it in his address about Italy, and Premier Orlando stated it also.

Mr. THOMAS. I accept the assurance that there was such an agreement.

Mr. MOSES. So, with the President insisting that Fiume pass to the Serbo-Croatian-Slovenian State, it is merely a choice between two secret treaties.

Mr. THOMAS. It is not, because each of the treaties should be recognized and enforced if one is. Great Britain and France are in no position to deny to Italy that which they promised her, and they are bound, if there was a secret treaty with the Serbian interests, also to recognize that.

Mr. MOSES. Then would the principle of self-determination ultimately fix the disposition of Fiume?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the principle of self-determination announced by the President of the United States was announced long after the secret treaties were made. If the Senator wants my opinion about it, I will say that self-determination should be considered as one of the elements in the ultimate disposition of Fiume, provided Fiume be considered not merely as a city and harbor but as the outlet of a very densely populated region in the hinterland.

So far as Bulgaria is concerned, I am inclined to agree with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] in his criticisms of the American attitude concerning that country—not of the attitude itself but of the general situation. We never declared war against Bulgaria. Bulgaria never declared war against America. Hence I should prefer leaving that mess between the nations immediately concerned, keeping out of it altogether, if possible. But I have no doubt, Mr. President, that for the purpose of encouraging—perhaps that is too strong a word—for the purpose of displaying a friendly attitude toward, Italy the American delegation did occupy and does occupy, with regard to Bulgaria, the position which Mr. Mowrer discloses. But it would seem that the Italian delegates, in conjunction with the Greek delegates, have by a collateral agreement sought to place the Government of the United States in a most embarrassing position, and one which the Italian emissaries doubtless assumed we would not recognize, in consequence of which they used that fact as a pawn in their dealings with Greece.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. McCORMICK. If the Senator will allow me, I want to ask him to return to a point in his remarks which he passed some time ago, because his opinion is important and influential on any phase of the treaty.

Mr. THOMAS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. McCORMICK. He spoke of the war as involving the United States permanently in the settlements to be made in Europe.

Mr. THOMAS. I think I said indefinitely.

Mr. McCORMICK. Indefinitely in the settlements to be made in Europe.

Mr. THOMAS. That is correct.

Mr. McCORMICK. These settlements require the United States to exercise its influence, due to its resources, in a fashion which alienates from the United States the nations upon whom pressure is brought to bear. We have an example in the case of Roumania to-day. I wish to ask the Senator if he will not consider the possibility of these settlements being maintained without the participation of the United States? The treaty itself contains instances of that sort in the commissions which it sets up for the control of the navigable streams. On those commissions there are to be representatives of several powers, great and small, but none of the United States. Would it not be possible for these bodies, subject to the proposed league, to be constituted of the representatives of the European nations immediately interested, without any representatives of the United States, so that we might not be obligated for troops or treasure in the future? The very cables which bring us word to-day of the action of Roumania and of the ultimatum supposed to have been handed to Roumania by the United States also bring us word that the British purpose to retire from the Caucasus and are asking us to send 80,000 troops thither to keep the peace.

I thank the Senator for his courtesy.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Senator's suggestions are extremely pertinent. Nothing would please me better than to see the ratification of a treaty, if it could be done, that would relieve the United States Government of the duty of maintaining a single commission or keeping a single soldier in Europe. I have no doubt that in the structure of the treaty every commission has been exclusively composed of those immediately concerned in Europe, excluding the United States, which could possibly be so constructed; but I can not perceive how the United States can fairly, with due regard to its obligations and attitude to the Allies, refrain from participating in the administration of the reparation clauses of the treaty or in those relating to the Saar Valley, and to the fixation of boundaries between Germany and the new countries to which, before and at the time we entered the war, we gave a virtual guaranty of independence in the event of our success.

Take Poland, for example. From the time the United States became a possible antagonist of Germany we extended the torch of hope to Poland. I think the President, in his address on the 2d day of April, 1917, specifically did that. I know that about the time of the armistice the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], in an address on this floor, asserted the right of Poland to independence as a result of the war; and the same hope extended to the Czecho-Bohemian combination, now known as Czechoslovakia, doubtless had an immense influence upon the ultimate result of the war, not only in bringing us victory but also in a speedy termination of the struggle.

We must, if we are to stand as we should before the public opinion of the world, discharge those obligations by such further participation in the affairs of Europe as may be essential. The mere geographical delimitation of Poland is not a guaranty of Poland's independence. The mere delimitation of the boundaries of Jugo-Slavonia and of Czechoslovakia does not accomplish anything more than the placing of these nations upon the map. They must have behind them the guaranty of the force that brought them into life until their independence is fully recognized and their ability to take care of themselves shall have been demonstrated.

I do not know whether that will ever be. I have an old-fashioned notion that but one race in the world is capable of self-government, and that is the race to which the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK] and I belong, and I think sometimes, and especially since the war, it may be a question whether even that race can successfully endure the ordeal of such responsibility.

Mr. McCORMICK. May I suggest to the Senator, in connection with the remark he made just before he concluded, that there is a line between the obligations of the United States arising out of the war, and which it must honorably discharge, and an unnecessary and fruitless interference in the composition of European differences.

Mr. THOMAS. Undoubtedly. But who is to draw it?

Mr. McCORMICK. The United States.

Mr. THOMAS. The United States have tried to do it and are still trying to do it. We are trying now. The Senate is inquiring into it every day.

Mr. McCORMICK. If the Senator will permit me, there are some of us who believe that in trying to draw that line one of the distinguished agencies of the United States reaches out too far. In the question of Thrace, for example, which is mooted at this moment, the great powers are divided upon the ultimate control of Constantinople. Why should the United States be invited, for example, to assume the responsibility of the government of Constantinople when Greece is there to assume the burden, or why should the United States be invited to dispatch 80,000 troops to the Caucasus when Greece is there ready to contribute her troops?

Mr. THOMAS. It is perfectly easy to understand, I think, why the United States has been requested to assume the control of the affairs of Constantinople. Constantinople is a cosmopolitan city. Napoleon said it occupied the most favorable position in the world. The contending jealousies, interests, suspicions, and ambitions of the European nations will be aroused against any of them to which the task is assigned. Hence the delegation of that duty to any one power in Europe naturally suggests the United States to the others as an outside power, uninfluenced by local considerations, and therefore more likely to discharge its obligations to the world as the custodian of the Bosphorus than any other power of the world.

With regard to sending 80,000 troops to the Caucasus, I think the Senator knows just as well as I do that no 80,000 troops of the United States will be sent there, no matter what the emergency may be, because American public opinion will not sustain it at this time. I know there is great need for an armed force in Armenia, the massacre of whose people continues sporadically. It is an aftermath of the war which thus far leaves a trail of blood somewhere behind it.

Now, coming back to Thrace for a moment, assuming it is true, and I have no doubt it is, that the great bulk of the population of that part of Greece which is the subject of controversy is Bulgarian, and remembering that it was wrested from Bulgaria after it had been given to her at the close of the first Balkan War by her former allies, Greece and Serbia, and also recalling that without it she can have no outlet to the sea, I can not but feel that the American attitude is the correct one. I am sure that, whether we are for the league of nations or not, we all yearn for an indefinite peace. The world of this generation is sick of war, and we shrink from any condition which will inevitably provoke war.

Mr. President, I can conceive of no cause so provocative of war in the early future as that which will arise from the denial to any of the nations of the right to the use of the great international highways of the world. If Bulgaria is to be excluded from enjoyment of harbors, if Jugo-Slavonia is to be denied a port upon the Adriatic, then just as sure as fate the pent-up forces and commercial jealousies and the feeling of wrong which nations, like individuals, cherish will result in another conflagration, possibly within the life of the present generation. Italy does not see it, Greece does not see it, or if so their desire for territory overcomes both their patriotism and their judgment.

Venizelos is a great statesman. I heard the statement of the President to which the Senator from Connecticut referred, and I have heard from the lips of others who have encountered Venizelos that he is the equal of any statesman in the world. He is one of the two or three great statesmen of continental Europe.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. In just a moment. It would seem that this great statesman, conscious of the critical condition of affairs in the world, is nevertheless, like American Senators, influenced more by the demands of his constituencies than his concern for world affairs. Therefore he is demanding Thrace because the Greeks demand Thrace. He is treating with Italy to secure Thrace because that is the only way in which he can secure it, and inasmuch as the United States has not seen fit to change its attitude and yield Thrace to his country, Mr. Simonds says he has declared himself from now on opposed to that league which he had as much to do in forming as any one man in the world, and only because he is dissatisfied with our attitude, which as to this particular controversy has been absolutely consistent with justice.

I now yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. MOSES. In full accord with what the Senator from Colorado has said as to the fruits of proceedings such as are now going on in Europe and in connection with the treaty, I wish only to point out that the making of ethnographic maps is the great indoor and outdoor sport of the Near East. If a Bulgarian makes a map of Macedonia or of Thrace, it is invariably colored green. If a Greek makes an ethnographic map of Macedonia or Thrace, it is invariably colored blue. If a Serb or a Roumanian makes a map of that section of the world, it is invariably colored with their national colors. But the historic fact yet remains that Thrace is essentially Greek. Its greatest city, Adrianople, bearing a Greek name, has a preponderant Greek population. It is true the Province fell to Bulgaria as one of the spoils of the first Balkan war, but it was only after the protest of the Greek people, and it was only by reason of certain negotiations similar to those now going on between Greece and Italy that the Enos-Medina line was agreed upon as the southern line for Bulgaria and that Kavala fell to Greece.

One other point needs clearing up. If this portion of the present Ottoman Empire should go to Bulgaria, she still would have no port on the Aegean. The only available port on that seacoast is the port of Kavala, a city which with its hinterland is preponderantly Greek. Bulgaria already has ports on the Black Sea fully capable of development. So she does not necessarily need the outlet of the Aegean Sea upon which the economic claim has been based.

But, Mr. President, everything the Senator from Colorado has said, and in which I fully concur, sheds an illuminating light upon the manner in which side steps are being made between the contestants while the great contest is going on in the peace conference, and so long as those various racial rivalries exist there will be a continuance of these side arrangements.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire, with the permission of the Senator from Colorado, speaking of the side steps that are going on while the peace conference is in session, if he knows how the President voted on the question of Japanese racial equality?

Mr. MOSES. I have no information. I am as ignorant of that as the Secretary of State was when we tried to get that information from him the other day.

Mr. THOMAS. I am obliged to the Senator from New Hampshire for his contribution to this discussion, which has already exceeded the limits that I supposed it would.

I am quite aware of the ethnological conditions in the Balkans, although I am not as familiar with them as is the Senator from New Hampshire. To me they have always been a reminder of the map of an active western mining district where claims lap and interlace in a tangled, confusing mass which even a mining engineer sometimes finds it difficult, if not impossible, to understand, where each locator colors his claim with the brightest colors possible, upon the assumption that the brighter the color the more legal the claim.

I am also, Mr. President, without any expectation or hope that any boundary fixed in the Balkans, or perhaps in central Europe, will continue very long, whether we have a league of nations or not, for these ethnographic differences, these racial animosities, are just as sure to find expression in friction culminating in explosion in the future as they have in the past.

Roumania is a conspicuous example of the manner in which a Balkan nation acts when it has the opportunity. Disregarding the order of the Allies and in face of the certainty that its food supplies will be cut off if disobedience follows the order, its armies have proceeded eastward until they have captured and now occupy Budapest, which they propose, if possible, to hold as part of their spoils of the war. I am glad that the Government of the United States has protested against her conduct. I hope the other allied countries will do so and follow up their protest, if necessary, by requiring that nation to observe the geographical limitations which it originally asserted.

We are in this situation and it is our duty to remain over there so long as it is necessary to our own obligations and therefore to our standing and national character, but not a moment longer. I do not wish to remain identified with European conditions the fraction of a second longer than our requirements demand.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the only purpose of my rising is to say a word to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. I think in the main I agree with what the Senator from Colorado has said. I did not really make any criticism about our alleged attitude toward Bulgaria, for I know nothing about it; I had no information about it. I simply saw the article by Frank H. Simonds in the newspapers and thought it was of interest. I did not know but that if attention were called to it in the Senate it might elicit some further information on the subject.

I am aware, I will say to the Senator from Colorado, that when I get interested in a debate perhaps the tone of my voice or my enthusiasm makes it appear that I lay down the law a little peremptorily or am a little imperious. I did not intend to be so.

Mr. THOMAS. I did not so understand the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is simply my nature. I merely wanted to have the Senator feel that I had no intention in any way of offending him by the perhaps spirited way in which I made my assertion.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from Connecticut could not offend me if he tried to do so.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am very glad to hear the Senator from Colorado say so. I shall certainly not try to offend him.

CLAIMS AGAINST MEXICO.

Mr. LODGE. From the Committee on Foreign Relations I report back favorably, with amendments, Senate resolution 106, and I submit a report (No. 145) thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. ASHURST. I certainly have no objection to the consideration of the resolution, but I wish to ask the distinguished chairman of the committee if he will consent to an amendment to the resolution?

Mr. LODGE. There are two amendments to the resolution which have been reported by the committee.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; there are two amendments which have been reported to the resolution and which are to be stated at the desk.

Mr. ASHURST. I will wait until they have been acted upon. I repeat, I have no objection to the present consideration of the resolution.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendments were, on page 2, line 11, after the word "country," to insert "and in general any and all acts of the governments of Mexico and its citizens in derogation of the rights of the United States or of its citizens," and in the same line, after the word "purpose," to insert "to sit at any time or place during the sessions of Congress or during recess and with authority."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. ASHURST. I wish to propose an amendment. I move to add at the end of the resolution the following: "; and the said committee shall further investigate and report to the Senate what, if any, measures should be taken to prevent a recurrence of such outrages."

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection to the amendment, though I think it is already covered in the resolution.

Mr. ASHURST. I shall be very glad to have the amendment adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to investigate the matter of damages and outrages suffered by citizens of the United States in the Republic of Mexico, including the number of citizens of the United States who have been killed or have suffered personal outrages in Mexico, and the amount of proper indemnities for such murders and outrages; the quantity of damages suffered on account of the destruction, confiscation, and larceny of personal property and the confiscation and deprivation of the use of lands and the destruction of improvements thereon; the number of citizens of the United States residing in Mexico at the time Porfirio Diaz retired from the presidency of Mexico, and the number of citizens of the United States at present residing in Mexico, and the nature and amount of their present holdings and properties in said country and in general any and all acts of the Governments of Mexico and its citizens in derogation of the rights of the United States or of its citizens; and for this purpose to sit at any time or place during the sessions of Congress or during recess and with authority to subpœna such witnesses and documents as may be necessary, and to make a report of its findings in the premises to the Senate; and the said committee shall further investigate and report to the Senate what, if any, measures should be taken to prevent a recurrence of such outrages.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The committee proposes to strike out the preamble.

The preamble was stricken out.

RESTRICTION OF EXPORTS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

Mr. CALDER obtained the floor.

Mr. MYERS. Will the Senator from New York yield to me for a minute?

Mr. CALDER. Yes.

Mr. MYERS. I had intended to ask that Senate resolution 157, relative to the restriction of exports, which was yesterday introduced by me, be laid before the Senate, but the Senator from New York having obtained the floor for the purpose of making an address, I ask that the resolution go over until Monday without prejudice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE NATION'S HOUSING NEEDS.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, side by side with the matter of the increased cost of food comes the question of providing housing facilities for the people of the United States. The need for homes is nation-wide, and is peculiarly acute in the State of New York.

Recently the legislature of that State passed a resolution dealing with the subject, and asked that it be presented to this body. It reads as follows:

STATE OF NEW YORK, IN SENATE,
Albany, June 16, 1919.

Whereas it appears from an investigation made by a joint committee of the Legislature of the State of New York that there is an alarming shortage of housing accommodations in the State, more especially in the city of New York, which demands relief, where possible, by action of Federal as well as by State authorities; and

Whereas Congress has recently passed a bill which received the approval of the President, creating Federal farm-loan banks, the main object of which is to afford farmers an opportunity to obtain long-term mortgages at reasonable rates: Therefore, be it

Resolved (if the assembly concurs), That the representatives of the State of New York in the Congress of the United States be respectfully requested to confer on the several Federal home-loan bills now pending in Congress, with the hope that they may unite on some measure that may be enacted at the present session which will accord to citizens who desire to own a home the same inducements now afforded to farmers by Federal statutes; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of the resolution be transmitted to the Representatives of the State of New York in the Congress of the United States.

By order of the senate.

ERNEST A. FAY, Clerk.

In assembly June 16, 1919.
Concurred without amendment, by order of the assembly.

FRED W. HAMMOND, Clerk.

Mr. President, the Congress of the United States can do little to relieve the necessities of the country in securing additional housing facilities except by encouraging a proper financing of housing undertakings, and with that purpose in view I have introduced Senate bill 2492, which creates a Federal home-loan banking system through the medium of the building and loan associations of the United States, thereby enabling the people of the country to obtain money on reasonable terms for the building of homes.

NATION-WIDE DEMAND FOR HOMES.

One of the most favorable indications during this period of reconstruction is the nation-wide movement to "own your own home." If one may judge from newspaper accounts, this movement has spread through the entire country, and, after all, it is but a natural consequence of the war, in which the whole Nation aroused itself to protect the home.

After the Civil War the homestead act greatly encouraged the establishment of settlements and of homes in the West. The shortage of housing brought about by the World War has again centered national attention on the necessity of homes, both rural and urban.

The home is the place for the raising and for the development of the family. While the investment in the home may not pay any direct returns as in buying and selling, it pays the greatest return of all investments through the increased efficiency of the family.

As the manufacturing and business processes become more highly specialized, the necessity of the relaxation of healthy home life is increasingly emphasized.

Municipalities are being aroused to the importance of protection not only of the home but also of the community, not only through laws preventing encroachment but also through the creation of community centers as well as through improved means of rapid transit.

Even in our larger cities, with a few exceptions, there are tracts of land which, with slightly improved transit facilities, might form large, healthful home communities.

In the final outcome we must either be a nation of home owners or a nation of tenantry. A wider distribution of the ownership of real estate, with the interest and responsibility incident to such ownership, more than any other factor, tends toward the betterment of our national citizenry.

ENCOURAGE SAVINGS TO SECURE HOMES.

The building and loan associations of the United States have encouraged saving for the purpose of home owning. I am told that these associations already have some 7,000 branches. These branches are administered by men of high repute in each community, who, in the big brother attitude, give their services to their fellow citizens. Members of each association deposit small amounts weekly, and when the member's deposit has reached a sufficient amount to cover an equity he may, if funds are available, obtain a loan for home building. The combined business done by these building and loan associations of the United States aggregated during the past year twelve hundred and fifty million dollars, and this business was done at a cost of about $\frac{8}{10}$ of 1 per cent. Further, the amount of the mortgages now held by them totals nearly $2,000,000,000, and that their business is conducted practically without loss, their mortgages being continually reduced by systematic amortization. However, as large as these assets appear to be, there are not sufficient funds available for home building, because the funds loaned must come from the amounts deposited weekly by the members, and frequently intending home builders are obliged to wait many months for their turn while the funds accumulate.

HOME LOAN BANKS WILL AID.

The purpose of the home loan bank bill is to make part of the $2,000,000,000 of good assets held by these associations immediately available for building. The following table gives statistics of the building and loan associations of the United States:

1918–1919.

RECEIPTS AND DISBURSEMENTS FOR 1918.

The aggregate receipts for 1918 from all sources were $1,325,313,352, which is an increase of $104,712,694 over the receipts of the previous year, but is $53,974,941 less than the increase shown by last year's report. The receipts from weekly dues for the year were increased $61,758,882, paid-up stock decreased $735,634, and deposits increased $20,506,927. Mortgage loans made decreased $11,802,655. There was an increase of stock withdrawals of $37,122,734 and of deposits of $28,131,857. The total expense of management was $10,319,842, or a little less than eight-tenths of 1 per cent of the total receipts. In detail, the receipts and disbursements for 1918 were as follows:

Receipts, 1918.

It is proposed that the Government license these associations to form into group organizations or local home loan banks, with which they may deposit their mortgages and receive long-term loans upon them, the funds becoming available through the issuance by the district home loan banks of salable bonds against mortgages deposited.

Licensing of the Federal Government would function to standardize these bonds and make them most attractive to the investor, with all the security of the well-placed first mortgage, and, in addition, the security of a collection of such mortgages backed by a reserve fund against possible loss.

It is hoped by those who have given this matter much thought that these securities may be sold on such favorable terms as to permit a minimum charge of interest to the home builder and save him the annoyance and hardship of commissions and bonuses so frequently suffered.

It is contended that while the facilities for general commercial banking have been greatly improved during the past decade through the rediscount system, the facilities for real estate banking remain in their antiquated form, and that there is a growing tendency on the part of institutions to loan only to the larger building and real estate operations, with increasing hardship on the small operator, driving him to individual and professional loaners and often involving him in uncertainty, extra commissions, bonuses, and higher rates of interest.

These people maintain that the real problem is to organize and correlate all the sources of capital that are normally utilized by the building industry, in order that a complete system of real estate banking may be worked out which would in no way conflict with the present system of commercial banking, but which would supplement it, and in the case of national emergencies, such as occurred during the war, strengthen it and bring together toward one focus the entire banking resources of the country.

That there is a great national shortage of building is questioned by none. Building, after all, is a part of the war debt. It must be paid after the war is over at an increased cost, paid for in the cost of building or in rent or in the general high cost of living through the shortage of facilities.

LITTLE PROMISE OF LOWER COSTS.

Authorities offer no encouragement that there is an approaching lowering of costs, the consensus of opinion being that we are all subject to influences beyond our control—the world shortage of men, materials, and plant, heavy tax burdens, and foreign political complications.

Lowering of prices through the curtailment of exports or the increase of imports seem impossible at the present time.

The only avenue remaining is the lowering of prices through increasing production.

The shortage of man power in the country points to the necessity of improved national facilities of every description. It is to be hoped that we are entering upon an era of industrial development which in effectiveness will outrun that occurring from 1865 to 1890, when machine methods replaced hand methods and tonnage production replaced pound production.

We are the wealthiest Nation in the world, wealthier than five of the next wealthiest nations combined. Our wealth is in the neighborhood of $265,000,000,000.

There is no nation on the face of the earth with so large and homogeneous a population. The moral characteristics of our people have been quietly but unmistakably indicated by their response to the draft and to the war loans.

It is said that we already have more than one-half of the tools of industry of the entire world, and these, together with our remarkable resources and with the spirit of American hustle, have made possible a higher standard of living in this country than in any part of the globe.

Now that we are facing a shortage of labor and commodity, let us improve our tools of industry and develop our national resources, for our assets are surely ample, and let us improve our credit facilities for necessary construction.

It is the belief of those interested in this legislation that the people who live in the cities of the country have as much right to expect encouragement from the Federal Government in the matter of obtaining homes as the man who lives on the farm does in securing a mortgage on his farm under reasonable conditions. The difference between this act and the farm loan act is that the Government is in no way obligated to take any bonds of the home loan bank nor in any way assume their payment.

To encourage the building of homes by providing for exemption from taxation of the income on mortgages on real estate.

This is the title of Senate bill 2094, introduced by me, which exempts from all Federal taxation the income from real estate mortgages, the total principal of which does not exceed $40,000, when held by an individual.

This bill, if enacted, would encourage individuals to lend their money on real estate mortgages. A great many people have always looked upon first mortgages on real estate as an ideal investment, and many men of large means have their money invested in securities of this character.

The heavy taxes levied upon incomes of every kind by the recent revenue act has had the effect of reducing the net income on many mortgages to less than 2 per cent, and the result is that millions of dollars are being withdrawn from this class of security and being invested in State and municipal bonds, which are exempt from taxation. Therefore, if we purpose doing anything to relieve the housing situation, we could do nothing more effective than to assist in their financing by exempting from taxation mortgages on real estate when in the hands of individuals.

It is an interesting fact that the mortgages on real estate in the city of New York total approximately $5,000,000,000, and of this sum about $2,000,000,000 is loaned by the savings banks, life insurance companies, and building associations, the income from which is exempt from all Federal taxation.

The other $3,000,000,000 is loaned by individuals, and as I indicated a moment ago, because of the tax on incomes, nets to the lender a return so small that these mortgages are being called in in large volume, thereby reducing the available money for building development.

Something must be done to improve this condition, and rather than have the Government go into the housing business, which has already cost us over $150,000,000, with little appreciable relief, it would be infinitely better to encourage private industry by passing the two bills I have described. The Government will not lose any revenue by this legislation, for with a good market for mortgage investments, which the enactment of these bills will bring about, the building industry would revive at once, and hundreds of millions of dollars would be put actively to work, many men would be employed, and the income from this business would more than offset the loss of revenue by exempting from taxation the bonds of the home loan bank and the limited number of mortgages that would be relieved by the second bill I have described.

The great difficulty to-day is in obtaining the necessary financial assistance for the construction of homes. There is an unusual demand for houses all over, despite the prevailing high prices, and there would be great building activity if it were possible to secure financial encouragement. The enactment of these two bills would tend materially to relieve the situation, and it is the only practical thing the Government can do to help.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CALDER. I do.

Mr. NELSON. Does not the Senator think that the great difficulty to-day is in the excessive cost of material and the excessive wages of labor?

My understanding is that there was to a large extent a suspension of building operations for private account during the war. Now, the war being over, it strikes me that there would be immense building operations carried on throughout the country if the price of materials would come down and be more moderate, and the wages of the workmen. Instead of that it seems that the workmen, the laborers and mechanics engaged in building operations, are insisting on still higher wages and striking here and there. Is not that really retarding building operations; and is not the effect of it that only in the most urgent cases will people resort to building under the high prices for material and labor that prevail to-day? Would not the laboring man be more favored, get a better opportunity for employment, and get more work readily if he were more moderate in his wages? Would not that expedite building operations?

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, it is my purpose to deal with the questions raised by the Senator from Minnesota further on in my remarks, but I will say to the Senator now that the high cost of building material, which I estimate is something like 110 per cent greater than four years ago, and the increased cost of labor, which is 40 per cent more than four years ago, has had much to do with the stoppage of building activities. In my judgment, however, such is the unusual demand for homes, there being a shortage of at least a million in the entire country, that building would proceed despite these things if capital were available. The insurance companies to which I referred a moment ago have obligated themselves in their contributions to the Liberty and Victory loans for almost their entire income for the next two years, leaving only the savings banks and savings and loan associations with a few private lenders to take care of the building needs at this time.

I know there is a great deal in what the Senator says; and in feeling out the pulse of the country on building questions it has seemed to me that many men hesitated because of the uncertainty of the future. They wanted to be sure that present prices would not come down, for, as the Senator knows, building is a different matter than raising things on the farm or manufacturing clothing or shoes or hats or other things for immediate need, because the man who builds houses to-day and offers them for sale necessarily competes with all the old houses that have been previously constructed. Of course no one would purchase a new house if he could buy an old one cheaper that would answer the purpose, and all of these things contribute to the result. Unquestionably, as the Senator suggests, the high cost of material and labor injures the development of real estate at this time, but my own judgment is that the need of money for financing building is retarding building activity to-day more than any other one thing.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CALDER. Yes.

Mr. KING. I was speaking with a builder quite recently. He resides in a large city, and he stated that one of the principal difficulties was not in securing capital, but it was because so many people were now leaving the smaller towns and leaving the farms and going into the cities, and those who had capital were uncertain as to the future of labor and the future of the cities themselves. That is to say, they were not sure that the large multitude now rushing to the cities would find employment there; and if they failed to find employment then, of course, if houses should be erected for them, within a short time those houses might be vacant because of the exodus of the people back to the smaller cities and the rural communities.

It seems to me that the irrepressible desire of the people to go to the cities, and the lack of development in the cities in the way of manufacturing so that employment can be had, will produce a scarcity of houses, and it will be inevitable so long as that tendency exists; and particularly will there be objection to the building of houses because of the high municipal taxes that are involved because of the extravagances of our municipalities.

Another gentleman with whom I was speaking stated that the taxes in the cities were increasing, that the officeholders were being multiplied, and that the extravagance and waste in municipal government was so stupendous as to make the taxes in the municipalities almost confiscatory; that is to say, that after paying the taxes, no matter how good your property was, no matter how favorably situated it was, the returns upon the investment were wholly inadequate.

I shall be glad if the Senator will touch upon that question in his address—the high taxes in the cities, the waste and extravagance of the municipalities, and the effect of the high taxes of the municipalities and State governments upon the question of housing.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, there is a great deal in what the Senator says. Men are afraid to invest heavily in real estate because of the things he suggests; but, Mr. President, there is need of houses for people to live in. There are not enough. I have information to that effect from all over the country. It was my privilege many years ago, before I came to the other House of Congress, to serve as the head of the building department of the city of New York and I have had direct contact with this subject, and I know, from a study of the problem, that we need houses for the people to live in. In New York City there are no vacant houses or apartments for people of moderate means. Rents are constantly increasing and many of our poorer families are doubling up, and while there has been considerable building this summer of smaller houses, when the fall comes and the people return from the country the situation will be worse than ever. My opinion in this matter is shared by many men who have studied the subject and they agree that what we need at this moment is financial facilities for going on with these building projects.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, there is another matter that occurs to me. To extend the building of homes, especially in the large cities, will necessarily involve spreading out into the country, away out into the suburbs. That being the case, unless you can make due provision for transportation to the suburbs, if men who settle in these suburbs are likely to be held up by strikes as you are to-day in Brooklyn, what good does it do the poor people to get houses and cottages away out in the country or the suburbs of a big city if you are unable to regulate the transportation, if the men who live in the suburbs are always at the mercy of strikes?

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, there is much to what the Senator says. We have a dreadful strike in Brooklyn just now, which is menacing to our peace and which is most damaging to the interests of the people who live in our suburbs. This is the first great railroad strike we have had since the late nineties, and I am hopeful that when this one is settled it will be settled for good. It is true that the people in the cities build their small homes for one or two families in the suburbs, and that is the sort of construction I should like to encourage. We have been building in New York, in the crowded centers, these great 20, 30, 40, and 50 family tenement houses, where there is no real home life. I want to encourage facilities that will tend to have the people move out in the outlying sections, where they can enjoy a real home life and bring up their children out in God's sunlight.

I will say to the Senator that around New York—and I think it is so in every crowded center—we have extended our transportation facilities, and when a new development comes we go out to it. I do not think there is any section in all the country better equipped than Brooklyn is now for transportation facilities into the suburbs. This has come about through the extension of our subway systems within the past few years.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator from New York yield for another inquiry?

Mr. CALDER. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think it would be a very wise idea if the chambers of commerce of the United States, taking the National Chamber of Commerce as the nucleus, should inaugurate a movement leading to the decentralization of the manufacturing industries of the United States? I have discovered that many of the manufacturing corporations and individuals who are engaged in the manufacturing business seek the large cities, because of the superior railroad accommodations, because of the advantages in terminal facilities, and so on.

Mr. CALDER. And perhaps because of the great amount of labor there.

Mr. KING. And because of the labor question, as the Senator has suggested. They seek those crowded centers for the establishment of their plants. It seems to me that if we should decentralize the manufacturing organizations and businesses, and induce the manufacturers to go into rural communities having railroad accommodations and build their plants there, it would solve to a large extent the housing problems and prevent the congestion of the population of the United States in the large cities, crowding them, as we are now, and as we will continue to do if the present manufacturing policy is adhered to. I believe that that would solve the question, and it would make for better conditions, better home life, for greater peace, for educational advantages, and for a higher citizenship.

In making this observation I do not wish to be understood as saying that those who reside in the cities are not the equals of those who reside in the country; but I do believe that many of our ills to-day, many of the problems that confront us could be solved if we could get our factories and our manufacturing establishments out in the country, away from New York, Chicago, and similar centralized points.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I concur in part in what the Senator from Utah says. But the greater railroad accommodations at the large cities and the port facilities at the seaports all tend to attract the great manufacturing plants toward these communities. But even if business were decentralized, and if it were possible to induce the owners of factories to go out into the smaller cities and towns, there would still be a need for houses for the people to live in. What I am endeavoring to show is that Congress must necessarily pass some legislation that will tend to encourage the building of homes by providing financial assistance.

DURING THE WAR THE GOVERNMENT DISCOURAGED BUILDING.

Senators will undoubtedly recall that over a year ago, when the question of appropriating money for Government housing was under advisement, I made the statement on the floor of the Senate, in reply to an inquiry from the late Senator Gallinger, of New Hampshire, that the relief afforded would be negligible. I pointed out then that the action of the Treasury Department and the Federal Reserve Board in discouraging the loaning of money for building purposes would bring on a situation that by this year would be exceedingly difficult. Building was also discouraged by the War Industries Board; in fact that board, over my protest, issued an order, which was generally obeyed, prohibiting building of every character without a permit from that board. Their object was, of course, to utilize the funds that would ordinarily go into building construction for the purchase of Liberty bonds and other war purposes. The War Industries Board also insisted that the material necessary for the construction of houses could not be spared and that the labor necessary for the same could be better utilized in manufacturing material for the Army and Navy abroad. I insisted that while every possible effort should be put forth to obtain for the Nation everything needed to carry out the war program, it was entirely unnecessary for us to break down the whole fabric of the building industry to carry out this purpose. I called the Senate's attention to this condition in detail, and I advised the War Industries Board that the complete destruction of our building organizations would undoubtedly work havoc in the future. The results indicate that the statements I then made were entirely correct, for when the war was over and those who had been engaged in building pursuits resumed their operations they were compelled to organize from the ground up. As a result we have had inefficient help in many of these plants during the present year. This, of course, has tended toward high production costs and has naturally increased the prices we must pay for houses. Prices have been so high that many men have been afraid to undertake construction work. In New York City rents have increased 50 per cent, and the cost of building houses generally, as compared with four years ago, has increased at least 80 per cent. Let me point out the difference in the price of material and labor in New York City between 1915 and 1919, and this same ratio exists throughout the entire country.

Average increase about 39 per cent.

Mr. President, the first of these tables indicates that the prices of building materials have increased 110 per cent between 1915 and 1919. The second table shows the union rates of wages paid in New York City in 1915 and indicates that the increases of wages in the building lines have been nearly 40 per cent. These things have tended largely, as they must naturally, to increase the cost of building, which, including material and labor, is about 80 per cent.

COOPERATION VERSUS COMPETITION.

The man engaged in the building industry to-day faces an entirely different problem than he did four years ago. During the war the policy of the Government was to divide its work among the different concerns in the same line, in proportion to their capacity to perform. There was a fixed price and a fixed profit. There was little or no competition. It was, as the President has put it in dealing with our labor troubles, a matter of collective bargaining. The prices of a given article were practically the same, no matter from where or by whom quoted. To-day one must pay practically the same price for what he buys no matter who sells it to him.

During the war we abolished the economic law of competition, and in its place have created a system of cooperation where men in every line of industry are assured a profit on their output. This is all very fine in theory, but what about the ultimate consumer? The man who builds houses to-day not only competes with other men who build under the same conditions but with men who have old houses for sale, houses built when prices for the material and labor that went into them were little over half what they are at present, and while this era of high prices has made large profits for those who were wise enough to purchase houses under old price conditions, the man who builds houses to-day runs a great risk of having difficulty in disposing of them unless they are unusually attractive and different in type from those built in prewar times.

No one will buy a new house when he can get an old one nearly as good as new for very much less in price. The problem is, how best can we assure the builder a profit reasonable enough to induce him to go to work. In every city in the Nation we are organizing associations to prevent profiteering in rents. That man is entitled to little consideration who will take advantage of present conditions and raise rents abnormally, but at the same time recognition must be given to the change in conditions, and the man who is compelled to increase his rents in keeping with larger carrying costs must be distinguished from the profiteer. If we are going to give any encouragement to the builder of new houses, if you are going to bring about a condition whereby rents will be stabilized, then you have got to give the man who takes the risk of building under such conditions every possible assistance.

On every hand we hear men argue that the workmen of the Nation should have a better understanding with the employer, and that there should be a division of profits. I am for all of these things, but there is a degree to which cooperation and collective bargaining can go which may completely destroy the entire business fabric, and unless a way is found to prevent abnormal profits in building materials, thereby tremendously increasing the cost of production, then there must be no complaint against high rents and greater prices for the sale of the finished building. My own opinion is that we are not, for many years, going to have any cheaper construction. While it is true that the wages of workmen are high, still, in comparison with the things these wages purchase, they are not too high. There is no evidence of the necessities of life being materially reduced in price.

GOVERNMENT SHOULD SELL DWELLINGS IT ERECTED DURING THE WAR.

I am in favor of the Government's selling all its buildings constructed last year for housing purposes just as speedily as they can be disposed of. I do not favor the Government's going into the real estate business. In view of the excessive cost of these buildings, I do not believe the Government can sell the houses it built last year for 50 per cent of their cost. I shall be glad if they can do so. This is no reflection upon those who had charge of the work. They were compelled to build under unusual conditions. Much of the work was done at overtime prices, and the material used was in many cases very expensive. There should be no complaint over the losses. I would have them sold out and disposed of and the whole matter cleaned up and for all time the Government refrain from entering into this kind of business again.

THE NATION NEEDS 1,000,000 HOUSES.

In the United States every year there is need of approximately $3,000,000,000 worth of building construction to meet the needs of the country. Of this total perhaps $2,000,000,000 worth is required for the housing of the people, the rest being used for industrial and amusement purposes.

To-day in the United States we are short nearly $4,000,000,000 worth of houses for our people to live in. We are something like a million homes behind the need. And for that reason those who have made a business of the construction of houses should have no misgivings about the beginning of construction, despite the high prices. Every assistance should be extended to enable our people to build or buy their own homes. Where there is a community of home owners no Bolshevists or anarchists can be found. It is written in history since the beginning of civilization that where people reside in their own houses there the best in government and civilization exists. And so if this Congress can do anything at all to relieve the present needs of the people in the matter of homes, it should do so at once. I have pointed out two ways in which they can help; first, by creating this home-loan banking system, thereby making available at least $2,000,000,000 of existing assets for building purposes; and, second, by relieving from taxation the income on a limited amount of real-estate mortgages in the hands of individuals, thereby encouraging investment in securities of this character, in the end making sufficient funds available for building purposes. These measures, in my opinion, would be exceedingly helpful, and I hope Senators will examine them and, if they agree with me, assist in securing their enactment.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 2 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until 3 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m., at which hour it reassembled.

JOINT MEETING OF THE TWO HOUSES.

The VICE PRESIDENT (at 3 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.). The hour having nearly arrived at which, in accordance with the concurrent resolution of the two Houses, the Senate is to proceed to the Hall of the House of Representatives to listen to an address by the President of the United States, the Sergeant at Arms will take charge.

Thereupon the Senate, preceded by its Sergeant at Arms and by the Vice President and the Secretary, proceeded to the Hall of the House of Representatives.

ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The address of the President of the United States this day delivered at a joint meeting of the two Houses of Congress is as follows:

GENTLEMEN OF THE CONGRESS: I have sought this opportunity to address you because it is clearly my duty to call your attention to the present cost of living and to urge upon you with all the persuasive force of which I am capable the legislative measures which would be most effective in controlling it and bringing it down. The prices the people of this country are paying for everything that it is necessary for them to use in order to live are not justified by a shortage in supply, either present or prospective, and are in many cases artificially and deliberately created by vicious practices which ought immediately to be checked by law. They constitute a burden upon us which is the more unbearable because we know that it is wilfully imposed by those who have the power and that it can by vigourous public action be greatly lightened and made to square with the actual conditions of supply and demand. Some of the methods by which these prices are produced are already illegal, some of them criminal, and those who employ them will be energetically proceeded against; but others have not yet been brought under the law, and should be dealt with at once by legislation.

I need not recite the particulars of this critical matter: the prices demanded and paid at the sources of supply, at the factory, in the food markets, at the shops, in the restaurants and hotels, alike in the city and in the village. They are familiar to you. They are the talk of every domestic circle and of every group of casual acquaintances even. It is matter of familiar knowledge, also, that a process has set in which is likely, unless something is done, to push prices and rents and the whole cost of living higher and yet higher, in a vicious cycle to which there is no logical or natural end. With the increase in the prices of the necessaries of life come demands for increases in wages,—demands which are justified if there be no other way of enabling men to live. Upon the increase of wages there follows close an increase in the price of the products whose producers have been accorded the increase,—not a proportionate increase, for the manufacturer does not content himself with that, but an increase considerably greater than the added wage cost and for which the added wage cost is oftentimes hardly more than an excuse. The labourers who do not get an increase in pay when they demand it are likely to strike, and the strike only makes matters worse. It checks production, if it affects the railways it prevents distribution and strips the markets, so that there is presently nothing to buy, and there is another excessive addition to prices resulting from the scarcity.

These are facts and forces with which we have become only too familiar; but we are not justified because of our familiarity with them or because of any hasty and shallow conclusion that they are "natural" and inevitable in sitting inactively by and letting them work their fatal results if there is anything that we can do to check, correct, or reverse them. I have sought this opportunity to inform the Congress what the Executive is doing by way of remedy and control, and to suggest where effective legal remedies are lacking and may be supplied.

We must, I think, frankly admit that there is no complete immediate remedy to be had from legislation and executive action. The free processes of supply and demand will not operate of themselves and no legislative or executive action can force them into full and natural operation until there is peace. There is now neither peace nor war. All the world is waiting,—with what unnerving fears and haunting doubts who can adequately say?—waiting to know when it shall have peace and what kind of peace it will be when it comes,—a peace in which each nation shall make shift for itself as it can, or a peace buttressed and supported by the will and concert of the nations that have the purpose and the power to do and to enforce what is right. Politically, economically, socially the World is on the operating table, and it has not been possible to administer any anesthetic. It is conscious. It even watches the capital operation upon which it knows that its hope of healthful life depends. It cannot think its business out or make plans or give intelligent and provident direction to its affairs while in such a case. Where there is no peace of mind there can be no energy in endeavour. There can be no confidence in industry, no calculable basis for credits, no confident buying or systematic selling, no certain prospect of employment, no normal restoration of business, no hopeful attempt at reconstruction or the proper reassembling of the dislocated elements of enterprise until peace has been established and, so far as may be, guaranteed.

Our national life has no doubt been less radically disturbed and dismembered than the national life of other peoples whom the war more directly affected, with its terrible ravaging and destructive force, but it has been, nevertheless, profoundly affected and disarranged, and our industries, our credits, our productive capacity, our economic processes are inextricably interwoven with those of other nations and peoples,—most intimately of all with the nations and peoples upon whom the chief burden and confusion of the war fell and who are now most dependent upon the cooperative action of the world.

We are just now shipping more goods out of our ports to foreign markets than we ever shipped before,—not food stuffs merely, but stuffs and materials of every sort; but this is no index of what our foreign sales will continue to be or of the effect the volume of our exports will have on supplies and prices. It is impossible yet to predict how far or how long foreign purchasers will be able to find the money or the credit to pay for or sustain such purchases on such a scale; how soon or to what extent foreign manufacturers can resume their former production, foreign farmers get their accustomed crops from their own fields, foreign mines resume their former output, foreign merchants set up again their old machinery of trade with the ends of the earth. All these things must remain uncertain until peace is established and the nations of the world have concerted the methods by which normal life and industry are to be restored and all that we can do, in the meantime, to restrain profiteering and put the life of our people upon a tolerable footing will be makeshift and provisional. There can be no settled conditions here or elsewhere until the treaty of peace is out of the way and the work of liquidating the war has become the chief concern of our government and of the other governments of the world. Until then business will inevitably remain speculative and sway now this way and again that, with heavy losses or heavy gains as it may chance, and the consumer must take care of both the gains and the losses. There can be no peace prices so long as our whole financial and economic system is on a war basis.

Europe will not, cannot recoup her capital or put her restless, distracted peoples to work until she knows exactly where she stands in respect of peace; and what we will do is for her the chief question upon which her quietude of mind and confidence of purpose depend. While there is any possibility that the peace terms may be changed or may be held long in abeyance or may not be enforced because of divisions of opinion among the Powers associated against Germany, it is idle to look for permanent relief.

But what we can do we should do, and should do at once. And there is a great deal that we can do, provisional though it be. Wheat shipments and credits to facilitate the purchase of our wheat can and will be limited and controlled in such a way as not to raise but rather to lower the price of flour here. The Government has the power, within certain limits, to regulate that. We cannot deny wheat to foreign peoples who are in dire need of it, and we do not wish to do so; but, fortunately, though the wheat crop is not what we hoped it would be, it is abundant if handled with provident care. The price of wheat is lower in the United States than in Europe, and can with proper management be kept so.

By way of immediate relief, surplus stocks of both food and clothing in the hands of the Government will be sold, and of course sold at prices at which there is no profit. And by way of a more permanent correction of prices surplus stocks in private hands will be drawn out of storage and put upon the market. Fortunately, under the terms of the Food Control Act the hoarding of food stuffs can be checked and prevented; and they will be, with the greatest energy. Food stuffs can be drawn out of storage and sold by legal action which the Department of Justice will institute wherever necessary; but so soon as the situation is systematically dealt with it is not likely that the courts will often have to be resorted to. Much of the accumulating of stocks has no doubt been due to the sort of speculation which always results from uncertainty. Great surpluses were accumulated because it was impossible to foresee what the market would disclose and dealers were determined to be ready for whatever might happen, as well as eager to reap the full advantage of rising prices. They will now see the disadvantage, as well as the danger, of holding off from the new process of distribution.

Some very interesting and significant facts with regard to stocks on hand and the rise of prices in the face of abundance have been disclosed by the inquiries of the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Labor and the Federal Trade Commission. They seem to justify the statement that in the case of many necessary commodities effective means have been found to prevent the normal operation of the law of supply and demand. Disregarding the surplus stocks in the hands of the Government, there was a greater supply of food stuffs in this country on June first of this year than at the same date last year. In the combined total of a number of the most important foods in dry and cold storage the excess was quite nineteen per cent. And yet prices have risen. The supply of fresh eggs on hand in June of this year, for example, was greater by nearly ten per cent. than the supply on hand at the same time last year and yet the wholesale price was forty cents a dozen as against thirty cents a year ago. The stock of frozen fowls had increased more than two hundred and ninety-eight per cent, and yet the price had risen also, from thirty-four and a half cents per pound to thirty-seven and a half cents. The supply of creamery butter had increased a hundred and twenty-nine per cent. and the price from forty-one to fifty-three cents per pound. The supply of salt beef had been augmented three per cent. and the price had gone up from thirty-four dollars a barrel to thirty-six dollars a barrel. Canned corn had increased in stock nearly ninety-two per cent. and had remained substantially the same in price. In a few food stuffs the prices had declined, but in nothing like the proportion in which the supply had increased. For example, the stock of canned tomatoes had increased one hundred and two per cent. and yet the price had declined only twenty-five cents per dozen cans. In some cases there had been the usual result of an increase of price following a decrease of supply, but in almost every instance the increase of price had been disproportionate to the decrease in stock.

The Attorney General has been making a careful study of the situation as a whole and of the laws that can be applied to better it and is convinced that, under the stimulation and temptation of exceptional circumstances, combinations of producers and combinations of traders have been formed for the control of supplies and of prices which are clearly in restraint of trade, and against these prosecutions will be promptly instituted and actively pushed which will in all likelihood have a prompt corrective effect. There is reason to believe that the prices of leather, of coal, of lumber, and of textiles have been materially affected by forms of concert and cooperation among the producers and marketers of these and other universally necessary commodities which it will be possible to redress. No watchful or energetic effort will be spared to accomplish this necessary result. I trust that there will not be many cases in which prosecution will be necessary. Public action will no doubt cause many who have perhaps unwittingly adopted illegal methods to abandon them promptly and of their own motion.

And publicity can accomplish a great deal. The purchaser can often take care of himself if he knows the facts and influences he is dealing with; and purchasers are not disinclined to do anything, either singly or collectively, that may be necessary for their self-protection. The Department of Commerce, the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Labor, and the Federal Trade Commission can do a great deal towards supplying the public, systematically and at short intervals, with information regarding the actual supply of particular commodities that is in existence and available, with regard to supplies which are in existence but not available because of hoarding, and with regard to the methods of price fixing which are being used by dealers in certain food stuffs and other necessaries. There can be little doubt that retailers are in part,—sometimes in large part,—responsible for exorbitant prices; and it is quite practicable for the Government, through the agencies I have mentioned, to supply the public with full information as to the prices at which retailers buy and as to the costs of transportation they pay, in order that it may be known just what margin of profit they are demanding. Opinion and concerted action on the part of purchasers can probably do the rest.

That is, these agencies may perform this indispensable service provided the Congress will supply them with the necessary funds to prosecute their inquiries and keep their price lists up to date. Hitherto the Appropriation Committees of the Houses have not always, I fear, seen the full value of these inquiries, and the Departments and Commissions have been very much straitened for means to render this service. That adequate funds be provided by appropriation for this purpose, and provided as promptly as possible, is one of the means of greatly ameliorating the present distressing conditions of livelihood that I have come to urge, in this attempt to concert with you the best ways to serve the country in this emergency. It is one of the absolutely necessary means, underlying many others, and can be supplied at once.

There are many other ways. Existing law is inadequate. There are many perfectly legitimate methods by which the Government can exercise restraint and guidance.

Let me urge, in the first place, that the present food-control Act should be so extended both as to the period of time during which it shall remain in operation and as to the commodities to which it shall apply. Its provisions against hoarding should be made to apply not only to food but also to feed stuffs, to fuel, to clothing, and to many other commodities which are indisputably necessaries of life. As it stands now it is limited in operation to the period of the war and becomes inoperative upon the formal proclamation of peace. But I should judge that it was clearly within the constitutional power of the Congress to make similar permanent provisions and regulations with regard to all goods destined for inter-state commerce and to exclude them from inter-state shipment if the requirements of the law are not complied with. Some such regulation is imperatively necessary. The abuses that have grown up in the manipulation of prices by the withholding of food stuffs and other necessaries of life cannot otherwise be effectively prevented. There can be no doubt of either the necessity or the legitimacy of such measures. May I not call attention to the fact, also, that, although the present Act prohibits profiteering, the prohibition is accompanied by no penalty. It is clearly in the public interest that a penalty should be provided which will be persuasive.

To the same end, I earnestly recommend, in the second place, that the Congress pass a law regulating cold storage as it is regulated, for example, by the laws of the State of New Jersey, which limit the time during which goods may be kept in storage, prescribe the method of disposing of them if kept beyond the permitted period, and require that goods released from storage shall in all cases bear the date of their receipt. It would materially add to the serviceability of the law, for the purpose we now have in view, if it were also prescribed that all goods released from storage for inter-state shipment should have plainly marked upon each package the selling or market price at which they went into storage. By this means the purchaser would always be able to learn what profits stood between him and the producer or the wholesale dealer.

It would serve as a useful example to the other communities of the country, as well as greatly relieve local distress, if the Congress were to regulate all such matters very fully for the District of Columbia, where its legislative authority is without limit.

I would also recommend that it be required that all goods destined for inter-state commerce should in every case where their form or package makes it possible be plainly marked with the price at which they left the hands of the producer. Such a requirement would bear a close analogy to certain provisions of the Pure Food Act, by which it is required that certain detailed information be given on the labels of packages of foods and drugs.

And it does not seem to me that we can confine ourselves to detailed measures of this kind, if it is indeed our purpose to assume national control of the processes of distribution. I take it for granted that that is our purpose and our duty. Nothing less will suffice. We need not hesitate to handle a national question in a national way. We should go beyond the measures I have suggested. We should formulate a law requiring a federal license of all corporations engaged in interstate commerce and embodying in the license, or in the conditions under which it is to be issued, specific regulations designed to secure competitive selling and prevent unconscionable profits in the methods of marketing. Such a law would afford a welcome opportunity to effect other much needed reforms in the business of inter-state shipment and in the methods of corporations which are engaged in it; but for the moment I confine my recommendations to the object immediately in hand, which is to reduce the cost of living.

May I not add that there is a bill now pending before the Congress which, if passed, would do much to stop speculation and to prevent the fraudulent methods of promotion by which our people are annually fleeced of many millions of hard-earned money. I refer to the measure proposed by the Capital Issues Committee for the control of security issues. It is a measure formulated by men who know the actual conditions of business and its adoption would serve a great and beneficent purpose.

We are dealing, Gentlemen of the Congress, I need hardly say, with very critical and very difficult matters. We should go forward with confidence along the road we see, but we should also seek to comprehend the whole of the scene amidst which we act. There is no ground for some of the fearful forecasts I hear uttered about me, but the condition of the world is unquestionably very grave and we should face it comprehendingly. The situation of our own country, as I have said, is exceptionally fortunate. We of all peoples can afford to keep our heads and to determine upon moderate and sensible courses of action which will ensure us against the passions and distempers which are working such deep unhappiness for some of the distressed nations on the other side of the sea: But we may be involved in their distresses unless we help, and help with energy and intelligence.

The world must pay for the appalling destruction wrought by the great war, and we are part of the world. We must pay our share. For five years now the industry of all Europe has been slack and disordered. The normal crops have not been produced; the normal quantity of manufactured goods has not been turned out. Not until there are the usual crops and the usual production of manufactured goods on the other side of the Atlantic can Europe return to the former conditions; and it was upon the former conditions, not the present, that our economic relations with Europe were built up. We must face the fact that unless we help Europe to get back to her normal life and production a chaos will ensue there which will inevitably be communicated to this country. For the present, it is manifest, we must quicken, not slacken our own production. We, and we almost alone, now hold the world steady. Upon our steadfastness and self-possession depend the affairs of nations everywhere. It is in this supreme crisis,—this crisis for all mankind,—that America must prove her mettle. In the presence of a world confused, distracted, she must show herself self-possessed, self-contained, capable of sober and effective action. She saved Europe by her action in arms; she must now save it by her action in peace. In saving Europe she will save herself, as she did upon the battlefields of the war. The calmness and capacity with which she deals with and masters the problems of peace will be the final test and proof of her place among the peoples of the world.

And, if only in our own interest, we must help the people over seas. Europe is our best customer. We must keep her going or thousands of our shops and scores of our mines must close. There is no such thing as letting her go to ruin without ourselves sharing in the disaster.

In such circumstances, face to face with such tests, passion must be discarded. Passion and a disregard for the rights of others have no place in the counsels of a free people. We need light, not heat, in these solemn times of self-examination and saving action. There must be no threats. Let there be only intelligent counsel, and let the best reasons win, not the strongest brute force. The world has just destroyed the arbitrary force of a military junta. It will live under no other. All that is arbitrary and coercive is in the discard. Those who seek to employ it will only prepare their own destruction.

We cannot hastily and over night revolutionize all the processes of our economic life, and we shall not attempt to do so. These are days of deep excitement and of extravagant speech; but with us these things are of the surface. Everyone who is in real touch with the silent masses of our great people knows that the old strong fibre and steady self-control are still there, firm against violence or any distempered action that would throw their affairs into confusion. I am serenely confident that they will readily find themselves, no matter what the circumstances, and that they will address themselves to the tasks of peace with the same devotion and the same stalwart preference for what is right that they displayed to the admiration of the whole world in the midst of war.

And I entertain another confident hope. I have spoken to-day chiefly of measures of imperative regulation and legal compulsion, of prosecutions and the sharp correction of selfish processes; and these, no doubt, are necessary. But there are other forces that we may count on besides those resident in the Department of Justice. We have just fully awakened to what has been going on and to the influences, many of them very selfish and sinister, that have been producing high prices and imposing an intolerable burden on the mass of our people. To have brought it all into the open will accomplish the greater part of the result we seek. I appeal with entire confidence to our producers, our middlemen, and our merchants to deal fairly with the people. It is their opportunity to show that they comprehend, that they intend to act justly, and that they have the public interest sincerely at heart. And I have no doubt that housekeepers all over the country, and everyone who buys the things he daily stands in need of will presently exercise a greater vigilance, a more thoughtful economy, a more discriminating care as to the market in which he buys or the merchant with whom he trades than he has hitherto exercised.

I believe, too, that the more extreme leaders of organized labour will presently yield to a sober second thought and, like the great mass of their associates, they will think and act like true Americans. They will see that strikes undertaken at this critical time are certain to make matters worse, not better,—worse for them and for everybody else. The worst thing, the most fatal thing that can be done now is to stop or interrupt production or interfere with the distribution of goods by the railways and the shipping of the country. We are all involved in the distressing results of the high cost of living and we must unite, not divide, to correct it. There are many things that ought to be corrected in the relations between capital and labour, in respect of wages and conditions of labour and other things even more far-reaching, and I, for one, am ready to go into conference about these matters with any group of my fellow countrymen who know what they are talking about and are willing to remedy existing conditions by frank counsel rather than by violent contest. No remedy is possible while men are in a temper, and there can be no settlement which does not have as its motive and standard the general interest. Threats and undue insistence upon the interest of a single class make settlement impossible. I believe, as I have hitherto had occasion to say to the Congress, that the industry and life of our people and of the world will suffer irreparable damage if employers and workmen are to go on in a perpetual contest, as antagonists. They must, on one plan or another, be effectively associated. Have we not steadiness and self-possession and business sense enough to work out that result? Undoubtedly we have, and we shall work it out. In the meantime,—now and in the days of readjustment and recuperation that are ahead of us,—let us resort more and more to frank and intimate counsel and make ourselves a great and triumphant Nation by making ourselves a united force in the life of the world. It will not then have looked to us for leadership in vain.

The Senate returned to its Chamber at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m., and the Vice President resumed the chair.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, August 11, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, August 8, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Good Lord, deliver us, we beseech Thee, from the unwarranted conditions in which we as a people find ourselves.

We have just passed through the greatest war of all history, and won a victory for democracy, liberty, and freedom from autocracy and oppression.

Thus we have cast out the demon of autocracy, but we have permitted seven devils to enter in, and the last state of the house is worse than the first.

The greatest trickster becomes for a day the greatest business man. The greatest trickster becomes for a day the greatest lawyer. The greatest trickster becomes for a day the greatest statesman. But honesty, justice, truth, righteousness, which are eternal, will assert themselves, right all wrongs, free the oppressed, and make life tolerable.

So we pray for a victory over the high cost of living and the deadly enemies of truth, liberty, and justice. In His name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 7110. An act extending the time for the construction of a bridge across Flint River, in the State of Georgia.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to an enrolled joint resolution of the following title:

S. J. Res. 80. Joint resolution to authorize the President to convene a meeting of an international labor conference in Washington, D. C.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution of the following title:

H. J. Res. 150. Joint resolution to suspend the requirements of annual assessment work on certain mining claims during the year 1919.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution 7.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the two Houses of Congress assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Friday, the 8th day of August, 1919, at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, for the purpose of receiving such communication as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make to them.

JOINT SESSION OF SENATE AND HOUSE.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask for the immediate consideration of the Senate resolution just messaged over.

Mr. BLANTON. I rise to the question of privilege which I submitted yesterday, which the Chair held was a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is disposed to think it is, but the gentleman from Wyoming arises to present a resolution which is also a question of constitutional privilege, and which the Chair thinks requires prior consideration.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Where a Member of the House is recognized by the Chair upon a question of high privilege, which the Chair admits is a question of high privilege, and then the Member is taken off his feet by the point of no quorum and the House is forced to adjourn, is there anything higher than that question of privilege when the House reassembles?

The SPEAKER. The fact that the question came up yesterday does not affect the question of priority to-day. The House adjourned yesterday so that the gentleman, of course, begins anew, as if he had not begun yesterday.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman in due time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the President of the United States is to address this House to-day upon important business of the Nation.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BLANTON. I think we should have a quorum here to make arrangements to receive the President in proper form. I make the point of no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. It is obvious that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this call 223 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask the Speaker to lay before the House Senate concurrent resolution No. 7, which has just been messaged over from the Senate concerning the joint session of the two Houses.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following resolution:

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution 7.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the two Houses of Congress assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Friday, the 8th day of August, 1919, at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, for the purpose of receiving such communication as the President of the United States shall be pleased to make to them.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the concurrent resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the Shantung proposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I presented yesterday what the Chair then deemed a question of privilege. Is it necessary for me to restate the question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would be wise for the gentleman to do so, because some Member here to-day who might not have been here yesterday may wish to make the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday last, August 2, 1919, in the RECORD of that date, on page 3580, after certain remarks had been made by myself concerning the railroad situation, the following colloquy occurred:

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes' time.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I must object to any more speeches not confined to the subject matter of the bill. We are trying to get these bills out of the way.

Mr. BURKE. I hope I shall be given time asked for to reply to the false statements just made here.

I call the attention of the Chair now to the fact that the only statements made preceding that colloquy were statements of fact which had been made by myself, so that undoubtedly the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BURKE] referred to the statements made by me when he said that certain false statements had been made. To show that that contention went over the country, unknown to me, however, for I did not hear the statement made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, although I was present in the Hall at the time—and if I had known that he had made the statement applying to me, I would have answered the same at that time—in the Fort Worth Star-Telegram appears a dispatch giving a report of the proceedings of Congress sent by the staff correspondent, Mr. Leo R. Sack, under a Washington date of August 2, and that is as follows:

WASHINGTON, August 2.

Representative BLANTON, in a five-minute speech on the floor of the House, in a formal statement to-day, charged—

And so forth.

Then occurs the following in that same dispatch:

Representative BURKE, of Pennsylvania, himself a member of the brotherhood, accused BLANTON of false statements.

Without going further into the matter, I submit that where a Member of Congress in the RECORD and on the floor of the House is accused of making false statements, and the press of the country carried that information to the people that false statements have been made, it constitutes a question of the highest privilege. I submit that to the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The rulings and decisions on the subject are quite clear. The Chair is disposed to think that the newspaper statement would hardly raise the question of privilege, because it has been held that where a newspaper simply quotes what a Member has said on the floor it does not of itself constitute a question of privilege. There is a precedent exactly in point, however, decided by Mr. Speaker Carlisle, where one gentleman in the House accused another of having made a false statement. The Speaker then held that that did raise a question of personal privilege. The Chair is disposed to think that the question of personal privilege is raised here, although he would be very glad to hear anyone who desires to argue the matter.

Mr. BURKE rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania desire to be heard?

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. Respecting the procedure of the House, is it proper when a Member addresses the Chair on a question of personal privilege for another Member then to rise and reserve the right to object?

The SPEAKER. Of course the gentleman can not reserve the right to object, but the Chair will hear the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he wishes to argue the point of order.

Mr. BURKE. Just the same privilege after the gentleman from Texas finishes.

The SPEAKER. It is merely a question of personal privilege that is before the House, and it depends upon whether anything is said by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] as to whether the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be entitled to the floor.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Texas yield to a question?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly; provided I am not taken off the floor.

Mr. WHEELER. I simply wanted to ask a question. As I understand it, no name was mentioned in the RECORD?

Mr. BLANTON. But the RECORD shows to whom the gentleman from Pennsylvania referred. There were no other remarks.

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania stated that a false statement had been made on the floor of the House.

Mr. BLANTON. That it had "just" been made.

Mr. WHEELER. He mentioned no name.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is disposed to think that the RECORD shows very clearly to whom the gentleman from Pennsylvania referred. The gentleman from Texas is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, every statement of fact that was made by me on Saturday last concerning the railroad situation is backed up by reports of the Railroad Administration of the United States and conditions well known to every posted man in this Nation. I stated, first, that the Adamson law was the result of threats made by the brotherhoods of the country, dire threats, to tie up the railroads of the United States so tight that it would destroy the usual industrial activities of the country.

And the gentleman's general denial that my statements were false has tended to make some believe the statement made by me was false, and I can not permit him to thus becloud the RECORD. Is there a man in this House who will question the truth of the statement——

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I question the statement of the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman question the statement that it was by dire threats that the Adamson law was passed?

Mr. KING. I certainly do. I deny the gentleman's statement upon the floor of this House.

Mr. BLANTON. It shows how little posted the gentleman from Illinois is on the affairs of his country.

Mr. KING. The gentleman was not present here. He was down on the prairies of Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. That didn't keep me from being informed. Mr. Speaker, I refuse to be interrupted further until I get through. Every posted man in this country knows that it was threats by the brotherhoods that caused the Adamson law to be passed. I stated that the brotherhoods were not satisfied with that acquirement in the way of legislation but that during war times, when the soldiers of the country were in the trenches of France knee deep in mud, trenches that were cootie infected, fighting for their country for $33 a month, these same railroad brotherhoods in war time came to Director General McAdoo and by dire threats forced him to give them an annual increase of $754,811,000 of the people's money—that they forced it by threats in war time. Is there a man so poorly posted in this House as to question the truth of that statement?

Mr. KING. I absolutely deny the gentleman's statement.

Mr. BLANTON. It again evidences how very poorly informed the gentleman from Illinois is on the current history of his country, because the report from the director general's office shows that these increases of $754,811,000 were granted, and the posted public knows they were granted upon threats. I stated that they were not satisfied with that; that they were not satisfied with what they had drawn through such threats from this Government, made upon Mr. McAdoo and upon Congress, and they came to Director Hines almost before his seat had gotten warm in office, and by threats similar—to tie up the railroads of the country and even of revolution—they made him dig up out of the Public Treasury $67,500,000 more in annual increases. This $822,311,000 has come out of the people's Treasury. It has been produced by increased freight and passenger rates. It has been in the nature of a tax upon the 110,000,000 people of the United States. And have they stopped? No. They now come to the President and to Congress and say that you must grant us an additional increase of a billion dollars. Else what? What does Mr. Jewell say, the acting president of the railroad brotherhoods' department of the American Federation of Labor? On last Tuesday Mr. Jewell, through the press of this country, said that if Congress does not accede to our demands right now we are going to tie up every railroad in this land so tight that they can not run, and we will elect a Congress that will carry out our wishes. And we Congressmen sit here on our seats and truckle, truckle, with anarchy invading our land. The President of the United States is the greatest man living to-day, in my judgment, and yet he is human. We are now experiencing the fruits of our Nation's truckling in the passage of the Adamson law, the most colossal blunder of Woodrow Wilson's whole life. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BLANTON. We gave notice then——

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point of order that the gentleman, by attacking the President of the United States, is not speaking to the question of personal privilege.

Mr. BLANTON. A Congressman has a right to criticize anybody. This is a Republic.

Mr. KING. And I ask for a ruling upon it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will confine himself to the point of order——

Mr. BLANTON. I am discussing a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. To the question of privilege. The Chair is disposed to sustain the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois. At that time the gentleman was not discussing the question of personal privilege.

Mr. BLANTON. Are we going to sit here and truckle some more or are we going to be men? Are these threats that are coming to me because I raise my voice against this plundering Plumb plan—these threats against my life that have come to me daily—are they coming to you? Why, organizations of the whole State of Georgia sent me a threat yesterday that they were going to publish in every newspaper of my country the fact that I was their enemy and should be replaced by a friend of the brotherhoods, thinking they would intimidate me; and you find representatives of those brotherhoods coming before your committee and Congress saying that if you do not do like we ask, we are going to elect a Congress that will obey our will——

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Wyoming rise?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that the gentleman was recognized for a question of personal privilege with a view of giving him an opportunity to prove the accuracy of certain statements he has made, the truthfulness of which has been questioned. The gentleman is certainly not pursuing that line at this time. The gentleman is discussing another and different matter.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I beg to be heard to show I am doing it. By accusing Congress of truckling——

Mr. MONDELL. I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the matter raised by his question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming has correctly described the issue——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I may have committed lese majeste when I did so, but I accused Congress of having truckled in the past. The gentleman said my statements were false.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order, and ask that the gentleman's words be taken down.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas makes the point of order that the words of the gentleman from Texas are out of order, and demands that they be taken down. The Reporter will report the words to the Chair.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I still make the statement that Congress has truckled.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I suggest the gentleman from Texas now take his seat.

Mr. BLANTON. I will wait until the order is decided, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, to save time I will withdraw it.

Mr. WINGO. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the words.

Mr. WINGO. The rules are very clear. The gentleman should keep his seat until the House is in order.

Mr. BLANTON. I withdraw the words. I have heard the gentleman from Arkansas make it.

Mr. WINGO. You have not. He can not withdraw them by unanimous consent, because I object. There is an end to all patience.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the words taken down.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I may have committed lese majeste when I did so, but I accused Congress of having truckled in the past. The gentleman said my statements were false.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, the language I object to is where he accused Congress of truckling.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, following the use of the language just reported by the Clerk, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] renewed the accusation against Congress.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. Would I be permitted to put certain Congressmen on the witness stand and prove that Congress has truckled?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order on that, and I ask that it be taken down. I make the point of order on that very disorderly and unparliamentary language, and I ask that it be taken down, and I intend to move that it be stricken from the RECORD. We are not going to have, under the guise of a point of order, the rules violated.

The SPEAKER. The words referred to by the gentleman will be taken down.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. May I ask the Speaker what authority this Congress has to pass upon the violation of lese majeste of a previous Congress or some other Congress?

Mr. WINGO. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman is out of order.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk has not yet reported the words.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Did not the gentleman from Texas offer to withdraw these remarks?

The SPEAKER. He did. The Chair put that question to the House, whether he should be allowed to withdraw, and objection was made.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know. That is the very thing I wanted to ask about. Has it not been the practice of the House that when words that were supposed to be offensive to some gentleman and the man who made them offered to withdraw them it was done without objection?

The SPEAKER. I think it is very rarely that there has been objection.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Has anybody a right to make an objection?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed by the parliamentary clerk that he has.

Mr. WINGO. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri that under the rule the Speaker cited it had to be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I have ruled a dozen times when a man wanted to withdraw remarks that he could do it. I remember very well that the gentleman from New York, Mr. London, on one occasion made some remarks that were offensive to Mr. Austin, of Tennessee, and Mr. Austin undertook to make a motion to have him reprimanded or expelled, and I sent the parliamentary clerk down to Mr. London and asked him to withdraw the language, and he did it, and that was the end of it.

The SPEAKER. The last decision in the Manual, on page 330, provides:

Words so taken down may be withdrawn only by unanimous consent. (Chairman Foster, June 3, 1918, p. 7901.)

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I think that was in committee and after the words were taken down and reported to the House. I think before the words are reported to the House they may be withdrawn in the House, but where the words are taken down and reported to the House they can only be withdrawn by unanimous consent.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Suppose a gentleman of the House should utter the most offensive words about another Member, and after he has made them, and while they were being taken down, he should withdraw them, or should withdraw them after they are taken down. If he can withdraw them before they are reported to the House, then I could make all kinds of offensive remarks, if I chose to do so, so offensive that I would deserve to be expelled——

Mr. WINGO. And thereby defeat the very object of the rule.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; and get away with it.

The SPEAKER. It seems to the Chair that the logic suggested by the gentleman from Illinois is sound, and the Chair will adhere to the rule.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, has the first language been reported?

The SPEAKER. Of course, it is unusual for objection to be made. The Clerk will report the language at the beginning.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I may have committed lese majeste when I did so, but I accuse Congress of having truckled in the past. The gentleman said my statements were false.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] makes the point of order that the words of the gentleman from Texas are out of order and demands that they be taken down.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, the report is not complete.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will wait until the Clerk reports it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I still make the statement that Congress has truckled.

* * * * * * *

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. Would I be permitted to put certain Congressmen on the witness stand and prove that Congress has truckled?

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. WINGO. I move to strike out the offensive language read, and on that I move the previous question. I recall that it is not debatable.

Mr. BLANTON. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] moves to strike out the offensive language read.

Mr. WINGO. The offensive language of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] reported by the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. The offensive language uttered by the gentleman from Texas and reported by the Clerk.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas calls for the yeas and nays.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. QUIN. In order to prove that the gentleman from Texas is not out of order, I want to ask if Webster's Dictionary is not a good authority?

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry. As many as favor taking this vote by yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Five gentlemen have risen—not a sufficient number. The question is on ordering the previous question, as demanded by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to strike out the language.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 70, noes 90.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas makes the point of no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and eighty-one Members, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. As many as are in favor of striking out the words will when their names are called vote "yea," those opposed "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 82, nays 135, answered "present" 8, not voting 204, as follows:

Mr. FORDNEY with Mr. KITCHIN.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I voted "nay," but I am paired with the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. ASHBROOK, so I wish to withdraw my vote and to answer "present."

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, having inadvertently overlooked a pair that I have with the gentleman from California, Mr. BARBOUR, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my vote on the proposition to strike from the RECORD certain remarks made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] and be marked "present."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the change will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, did the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. FORDNEY, vote?

The SPEAKER. He did not.

Mr. KITCHIN. Then I desire to withdraw my vote of "nay" and answer "present."

The name of Mr. KITCHIN was called, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House stand in recess until 15 minutes of 4 o'clock.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman that I will be able to conclude in five minutes more, if I be not interrupted. I have a few matters that I desire to state. I can conclude in 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. BLANTON. I do, because I do not like to be taken off the floor.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman has already been taken off the floor.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, no; the words were not stricken out.

Mr. WINGO. It does not make any difference whether they were or not.

Mr. BLANTON. I will conclude in 10 minutes if the gentleman will not interrupt me.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman from Wyoming that in all fairness to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BURKE] he ought to be given some time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming. Did the gentleman from Arkansas make a point of order?

Mr. WINGO. Yes; the point of order is this: If the Speaker will refer to the precedents, I think he will find that I am right. A point of order was made against the language of the gentleman and, under the rules of the House, the Speaker, by permitting the proceeding and entertaining a motion to strike out, thereby held that the language was unparliamentary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not so recollect. He did not so hold.

Mr. WINGO. I say that by that action the Chair did.

The SPEAKER. The Chair may be mistaken in his recollection, of course.

Mr. WINGO. I say that by that action the Chair did. I made the point of order on the language and asked that the words be taken down.

The SPEAKER. The Chair's understanding was not that the gentleman had made a point of order.

Mr. WINGO. Yes; I arose, made a point of order against the language, and demanded that the words be taken down.

The SPEAKER. He asked that the words be taken down. The Chair thinks that if the gentleman had made the point of order he would have asked the Chair to rule.

Mr. WINGO. It was up to the Chair. The practice of the House heretofore has been for the Speaker, if he thinks the words are disorderly, and that the House should pass on whether or not they should stay in the RECORD, then to entertain the motion to strike out. If the Speaker, when the words were reported and I made the motion, had held that they were not disorderly, he would have ruled that they were not disorderly and would have ruled my motion out of order, but the Speaker did not do that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair made no ruling at all. Let the Chair state the matter. There are two methods. The gentleman can make the point of order on the words, and the gentleman can demand that the words be taken down. The gentleman from Arkansas says that he did both. That may be so. The Chair did not so understand it. The Chair made no ruling at all on the question, and it would naturally seem to the Chair, if the gentleman did make the point of order, that he would have asked the Chair to rule upon it.

Mr. WINGO. With the Speaker's statement that he did not pass upon it one way or the other, I shall not press the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I stated that the duties of a passenger conductor were not arduous; that prior to these increases he received a salary of from $135 to $165 per month. Since these increases have been granted, according to a statement that I have from the Director General of Railroads for the United States, the passenger conductors on railroad trains now receive an average salary of $180 a month, plus time and a half for all overtime, which runs their salaries up in many cases considerably over $200 a month. They work eight hours a day, six days a week, having one day off in every week. They ride in comfortable coaches, out of the weather, and they eat in lavish dining cars at reduced rates. They have porters to wait on them, and they even have auditors to take up the tickets for them, and may I say in this connection that there are employees on freight trains to-day who receive more money from this Government than a colonel in the United States Army.

Yet we are asked for a cool billion of dollars in raises, and we are asked to do what McAdoo did and what Hines did under the lash of threats, to date the raise back to the 1st day of January of this year.

I have no personal feeling in the matter. I have the highest regard for my colleague. One of my best friends that I have in this House is the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER], that able, moral, highly respected legislator, God bless him, and there is no man here who deserves more credit, for he came to Congress from an engine cab, and I take off my hat to him. There is no man in this whole country for whom I have higher respect and regard and personal friendship, but he is not the kind of man, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BURKE] is not the kind of man, who controls these brotherhoods. They are controlled by the radicals, by men like Plumb and Jewell and Stone, who want to take $20,000,000,000 of private property from widows and orphans and little minor children whose ancestors possibly have acquired it through a lifetime of thrift, energy, and effort. He wants to wipe out the security of private rights in private property. Oh, Mr. Speaker, we have been too busy in making the high seas safe for a few rich Americans to travel upon, and we have forgotten to make the sacred soil of America safe for Americans to live upon. [Applause.] I said they came to us like highwaymen. Have they not? No highwayman ever presented to his victims a deadlier weapon. Mr. Jewell says we have got to grant them a cool billion dollars in wages and that we must give them $20,000,000,000 of private property.

What is the alternative? What is the weapon that he points at the heart of this Republic? That he would tie up the railway industry so tight that not a train will run. Food distribution ceases, coal shipments stop, innocent women and children are to freeze this winter. And you have got a threat in the newspapers here in the Nation's Capital that to-morrow you will not be able to bring a train in or take a train out. You have got members of the brotherhood down here on guard in a peaceful country that has just spent $40,000,000,000 to make the world a safe place to live in, picketing by force all yards and shops, who will kill and murder if necessary. You have got them down here right now on guard in an effort to prevent honest Americans from working who want to work. If Congress will pass the resolution that I put in that basket awhile ago there will not be any tie-up. There will not be any further interference with the transmission of interstate mails and traffic. If Congress will pass the resolution that I put in the basket awhile ago there will not be any truckling or acceding to threats and there will not be any $20,000,000,000 taken from the pockets of private citizens and turned over to these marauders of a Republic. It is nothing but open brigandage hitherto not tolerated by a Republic.

I have introduced a resolution here in that basket which you may term a third declaration of war. The last two were declarations of war in foreign countries and this is a declaration of war that makes the soil of the United States sacred to the American people and is to make America a safe place to live in. It authorizes and directs the President of the United States to run the anarchy and anarchists out of this country. It turns over to the President and pledges to him the entire Naval and Military Establishments of this country to put to sleep forever and eternally certain socialistic doctrines, as the Plumb plan [applause]; a doctrine which even to be considered by Congress is a travesty upon good common sense and justice of this country. Highwaymen! In that connection they talk about lowering the high price of living. I call my good friend's attention to the fact that Mr. Henry Bacon, the great shoe manufacturer of Haverhill, Mass., through just such threats and strikes, has been forced to pay the men in his factory who cut shoe linings for shoes $120 a week for 44 hours a week and he pays the men who cut the leather from $70 to $80 a week for 44 hours a week, and they do not work one single minute on Saturday or Sunday. They only work five days a week. These shoe-lining cutters have got to have their four Saturdays in each month in order to spend that $480 for 20 days' work that they receive. Four hundred and eighty dollars for 20 days' work! If you will get the Rochester Herald of April 10 last you will see the declaration of the organization of the Electrical Workers' Union, whereby they state that thenceforth every journeyman must be paid $9 a day for six hours' work; that their foremen of five men or more must receive $10.50 a day for six hours' work, and for all time over six hours they must be paid $3 an hour for overtime. They further declare, and they put it in existence and in practice, that whenever they are called upon to work in the rain or in the snow they must be paid $18 a day for six hours' work. They further declare that on every Saturday they shall work only three hours and yet receive a full day's wages. There is the secret of your high cost of living. There has been a decrease in production all down the line. There have been too many men working too few hours, and for wages far in excess of the value of their services. Why, when I was on a farm it was a question of who could pick the most cotton in a day, who could chop the most cotton and the most corn, who could plow the most acreage. It was a question of efficiency, a question of the greatest production. That is the problem of the farm. There is not a member of these brotherhoods, there is not a member of union labor anywhere that produces one single product raised from the farm. It is to their interest to cry down the price of every farm product while they are raising the price of everything that the farmer uses on the farm through the increased wages they receive. It is a class privilege which has grown up in our land that has secretly and quietly grown up through the organization which Mr. Jewell says and which Mr. Plumb says is so strong that they can come before your Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and brazenly tell it through their representatives and Mr. Plumb that if you do not do like we ask there is going to be a revolution in this country. A revolution! Now, men, it is up to us. Congress has now reached the Marne.

I ask you, you men, you good men of Congress, who are brave, who I know have never truckled in your life, I ask you good men, do not begin now to truckle. [Applause.] I ask you to take such steps that will wipe out of this whole Nation every single vestige of Bolshevism [applause] that has been existing and growing so long. [Applause.] If this Congress does not do something of that kind, then I want to tell you this, that we will brand ourselves from San Francisco to Florida as arrant cowards, afraid to do our duty, afraid to carry out our oath to the Constitution that makes us uphold the principles of that flag for which this Nation has fought for so many years. Gentlemen, I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Speaker, I ask the privilege of replying to the remarks made by the gentleman on last Saturday.

The SPEAKER. For how long a time?

Mr. BURKE. It will take only a few minutes.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman must state the time.

Mr. BURKE. It will not take more than 10 minutes

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes in reply to the gentleman from Texas? Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I take this opportunity to reply to some remarks made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] in this Chamber last Saturday, at which time, I think, he very unfairly and unwarrantedly made an assault on the four railroad brotherhoods, and also made incorrect statements as to how the membership of the brotherhoods were paid in the way of overtime, and the number of days they worked monthly to get the monthly guaranty.

Let me read from the RECORD of Saturday the gentleman's own statement regarding this. He says:

A passenger conductor at that time during the war, before the increase was granted, received $135 to $165 per month for eight hours' work, six days in the week, with time and a half for all time over eight hours.

This statement is incorrect. In the eastern territory the minimum wage for a passenger conductor at the time he refers to was only $135 for a 30-day month, and there was not then, and there is not now, time and a half for overtime. Let me quote the rule governing this as handed down by the arbitration board covering the eastern territory:

Regularly assigned passenger trainmen who are ready for service the entire month, and who do not lay off of their own accord, shall receive the following minimum sums, exclusive of overtime, for the calendar month: Conductors, $135.

The conductors, through their organization, and in conjunction with the other three organizations, have justly asked that time and a half for overtime be paid, but it has not yet been granted.

Mr. BLANTON. What is the gentleman reading from?

Mr. BURKE. What am I reading from? I am reading from my own statements, and they are facts, too, and the gentleman has the right to challenge them if they are not.

Mr. BLANTON. That is not in accordance with Mr. Hines's statement to me.

Mr. BURKE. I do not know what Director Hines said to you, but I know how the men are paid, and I do know that they are not paid time and a half for overtime. That is why I said before that your statement was incorrect.

He charges that the conductors ride in comfortable coaches, with porters to wait on them and auditors to collect the tickets. This statement on the face of it is so exaggerated that it is unworthy of comment.

The gentleman from Texas asserts that the railroad conductor comes in like a highwayman, threatening to tie up the traffic of the Nation so tight that railway activities and the business of the Nation will be destroyed unless this Congress gives the four great brotherhoods $1,000,000,000 more annual increase. I deny this charge and brand it as either exaggerated or made through the grossest ignorance. He says the brotherhoods are trying to make Congress truckle. I deny this, too. The brotherhoods are doing no such thing. When a wage question arises, they take it to the proper source, the board created by this Government for this purpose, and then to the Director General of Railroads.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be allowed to proceed for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania may proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may continue for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas has already preferred that request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURKE. The gentleman from Texas blames the railroad brotherhoods for keeping him in Washington at this time. The matter which has kept Congress here is the most vital question of the day, and it is a question that can not be sidestepped but must be squarely met. A universal cry and demand has gone out from the people of this country that the cost of the necessities of life must be lowered in price. The Order of Railway Conductors and the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, through their authorized representatives, carried an appeal to the President of the United States for relief from the exorbitant cost of living, and they were within their constitutional rights in so doing. In making an appeal for relief they voiced the sentiment of every American workingman in the country. And let me say here that if their appeal to the President of the United States to have the cost of living lowered is effective and brings action from this body to stamp out the crime of profiteering in the necessities of life, they will have rendered a public service to the people of the Nation.

The railroad men of the country need no defense by me. Their record of patriotism and loyalty to country is unequaled. During the war they stood faithfully at their post and gave the best that was in them to their country. They bought Liberty bonds and Victory bonds out of their earnings, and not only bought them, but gave their time in selling them. They had but one thought in mind—to win the war—and they worked unto this end. The younger members of the organizations answered their country's call in defense of liberty and to preserve the rights of humanity.

Personal malice against labor organizations or the working classes should not be aired in this congressional Chamber. What is wanted from this Congress is results beneficial to the Nation and the people. [Applause.]

Nearly 100,000,000 American people are suffering because they have not sufficient means to pay the exorbitant prices for the food that sustains life. Wage increases mean nothing, because as soon as an increase is granted the price of food goes soaring; shoes and clothing go skyrocketing in price and the American workingman is again facing the problem of trying to make ends meet on an insufficient wage.

Let Congress heed the cry of the people of this country and do something speedily to put an end to the exploitation of the American people by the profiteers and secure relief from the deplorable conditions now in existence. [Applause.]

I thank you, gentlemen.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

RECESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House stand in recess until 15 minutes to 4.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the House stand in recess until 15 minutes to 4. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Accordingly (at 2 o'clock p. m.) the House stood in recess until 3 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.

AFTER THE RECESS.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker.

JOINT MEETING OF SENATE AND HOUSE.

At 3 o'clock and 56 minutes p. m. the Doorkeeper announced the Vice President of the United States and the Members of the United States Senate.

The Members of the House rose.

The Senate, preceded by the Vice President and by their Secretary and Sergeant at Arms, entered the Chamber.

The Vice President took the chair at the right of the Speaker, and the Members of the Senate took the seats reserved for them.

The SPEAKER. The Speaker appoints on the part of the House as a committee to wait upon the President and escort him to the Hall, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], the gentlemen from Illinois [Mr. CANNON and Mr. MANN], the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN].

The VICE PRESIDENT. On behalf of the Senate, the Vice President appoints Senators CUMMINS, LODGE, SIMMONS, HITCHCOCK, and MCCUMBER.

At 4 o'clock and 1 minute p. m. the President of the United States, escorted by the committee of Senators and Representatives, entered the Hall of the House, was announced by the Doorkeeper, and stood at the Clerk's desk, amid applause on the floor and in the galleries.

The SPEAKER. Gentleman of the Senate and House of Representatives, the President of the United States. [Applause.]

ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT.

The PRESIDENT. Gentlemen of the Congress, I have sought this opportunity to address you because it is clearly my duty to call your attention to the present cost of living and to urge upon you with all the persuasive force of which I am capable the legislative measures which would be most effective in controlling it and bringing it down. The prices the people of this country are paying for everything that it is necessary for them to use in order to live are not justified by a shortage in supply, either present or prospective, and are in many cases artificially and deliberately created by vicious practices which ought immediately to be checked by law. They constitute a burden upon us which is the more unbearable because we know that it is wilfully imposed by those who have the power and that it can by vigorous public action be greatly lightened and made to square with the actual conditions of supply and demand. Some of the methods by which these prices are produced are already illegal, some of them criminal, and those who employ them will be energetically proceeded against; but others have not yet been brought under the law, and should be dealt with at once by legislation.

I need not recite the particulars of this critical matter: the prices demanded and paid at the sources of supply, at the factory, in the food markets, at the shops, in the restaurants and hotels, alike in the city and in the village. They are familiar to you. They are the talk of every domestic circle and of every group of casual acquaintances even. It is matter of familiar knowledge, also, that a process has set in which is likely, unless something is done, to push prices and rents and the whole cost of living higher and yet higher, in a vicious cycle to which there is no logical or natural end. With the increase in the prices of the necessaries of life come demands for increases in wages,—demands which are justified if there be no other way of enabling men to live. Upon the increase of wages there follows close an increase in the price of the products whose producers have been accorded the increase,—not a proportionate increase, for the manufacturer does not content himself with that, but an increase considerably greater than the added wage cost and for which the added wage cost is oftentimes hardly more than an excuse. The labourers who do not get an increase in pay when they demand it are likely to strike, and the strike only makes matters worse. It checks production, if it affects the railways it prevents distribution and strips the markets, so that there is presently nothing to buy, and there is another excessive addition to prices resulting from the scarcity.

These are facts and forces with which we have become only too familiar; but we are not justified because of our familiarity with them or because of any hasty and shallow conclusion that they are "natural" and inevitable in sitting inactively by and letting them work their fatal results if there is anything that we can do to check, correct, or reverse them. I have sought this opportunity to inform the Congress what the Executive is doing by way of remedy and control, and to suggest where effective legal remedies are lacking and may be supplied.

We must, I think, frankly admit that there is no complete immediate remedy to be had from legislation and executive action. The free processes of supply and demand will not operate of themselves and no legislative or executive action can force them into full and natural operation until there is peace. There is now neither peace nor war. All the world is waiting,—with what unnerving fears and haunting doubts who can adequately say?—waiting to know when it shall have peace and what kind of peace it will be when it comes,—a peace in which each nation shall make shift for itself as it can, or a peace buttressed and supported by the will and concert of the nations that have the purpose and the power to do and to enforce what is right. [Applause.] Politically, economically, socially the World is on the operating table, and it has not been possible to administer any anesthetic. It is conscious. It even watches the capital operation upon which it knows that its hope of healthful life depends. It cannot think its business out or make plans or give intelligent and provident direction to its affairs while in such a case. Where there is no peace of mind there can be no energy in endeavour. There can be no confidence in industry, no calculable basis for credits, no confident buying or systematic selling, no certain prospect of employment, no normal restoration of business, no hopeful attempt at reconstruction or the proper reassembling of the dislocated elements of enterprise until peace has been established and, so far as may be, guaranteed.

Our national life has no doubt been less radically disturbed and dismembered than the national life of other peoples whom the war more directly affected, with its terrible ravaging and destructive force, but it has been, nevertheless, profoundly affected and disarranged, and our industries, our credits, our productive capacity, our economic processes are inextricably interwoven with those of other nations and peoples,—most intimately of all with the nations and peoples upon whom the chief burden and confusion of the war fell and who are now most dependent upon the cooperative action of the world.

We are just now shipping more goods out of our ports to foreign markets than we ever shipped before,—not food stuffs merely, but stuffs and materials of every sort; but this is no index of what our foreign sales will continue to be or of the effect the volume of our exports will have on supplies and prices. It is impossible yet to predict how far or how long foreign purchasers will be able to find the money or the credit to pay for or sustain such purchases on such a scale; how soon or to what extent foreign manufacturers can resume their former production, foreign farmers get their accustomed crops from their own fields, foreign mines resume their former output, foreign merchants set up again their old machinery of trade with the ends of the earth. All these things must remain uncertain until peace is established and the nations of the world have concerted the methods by which normal life and industry are to be restored. And all that we can do, in the meantime, to restrain profiteering and put the life of our people upon a tolerable footing will be makeshift and provisional. There can be no settled conditions here or elsewhere until the treaty of peace is out of the way and the work of liquidating the war has become the chief concern of our government and of the other governments of the world. [Applause.] Until then business will inevitably remain speculative and sway now this way and again that, with heavy losses or heavy gains as it may chance, and the consumer must take care of both the gains and the losses. There can be no peace prices so long as our whole financial and economic system is on a war basis.

Europe will not, cannot recoup her capital or put her restless, distracted peoples to work until she knows exactly where she stands in respect of peace; and what we will do is for her the chief question upon which her quietude of mind and confidence of purpose depend. While there is any possibility that the peace terms may be changed or may be held long in abeyance or may not be enforced because of divisions of opinion among the Powers associated against Germany, it is idle to look for permanent relief. [Applause.]

But what we can do we should do, and should do at once. And there is a great deal that we can do, provisional though it be. Wheat shipments and credits to facilitate the purchase of our wheat can and will be limited and controlled in such a way as not to raise but rather to lower the price of flour here. The Government has the power, within certain limits, to regulate that. We cannot deny wheat to foreign peoples who are in dire need of it, and we do not wish to do so; but, fortunately, though the wheat crop is not what we hoped it would be, it is abundant if handled with provident care. The price of wheat is lower in the United States than in Europe, and can with proper management be kept so.

By way of immediate relief, surplus stocks of both food and clothing in the hands of the Government will be sold, and of course sold at prices at which there is no profit. And by way of a more permanent correction of prices surplus stocks in private hands will be drawn out of storage and put upon the market. Fortunately, under the terms of the Food Control Act the hoarding of food stuffs can be checked and prevented; and they will be, with the greatest energy. [Applause.] Food stuffs can be drawn out of storage and sold by legal action which the Department of Justice will institute wherever necessary; but so soon as the situation is systematically dealt with it is not likely that the courts will often have to be resorted to. Much of the accumulating of stocks has no doubt been due to the sort of speculation which always results from uncertainty. Great surpluses were accumulated because it was impossible to foresee what the market would disclose and dealers were determined to be ready for whatever might happen, as well as eager to reap the full advantage of rising prices. They will now see the disadvantage, as well as the danger, of holding off from the new process of distribution.

Some very interesting and significant facts with regard to stocks on hand and the rise of prices in the face of abundance have been disclosed by the inquiries of the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Labor and the Federal Trade Commission. They seem to justify the statement that in the case of many necessary commodities effective means have been found to prevent the normal operation of the law of supply and demand. Disregarding the surplus stocks in the hands of the Government, there was a greater supply of food stuffs in this country on June first of this year than at the same date last year. In the combined total of a number of the most important foods in dry and cold storage the excess was quite nineteen per cent. And yet prices have risen. The supply of fresh eggs on hand in June of this year, for example, was greater by nearly ten per cent. than the supply on hand at the same time last year and yet the wholesale price was forty cents a dozen as against thirty cents a year ago. The stock of frozen fowls had increased more than two hundred and ninety-eight per cent. and yet the price had risen also, from thirty-four and a half cents per pound to thirty-seven and a half cents. The supply of creamery butter had increased a hundred and twenty-nine per cent. and the price from forty-one to fifty-three cents per pound. The supply of salt beef had been augmented three per cent. and the price had gone up from thirty-four dollars a barrel to thirty-six dollars a barrel. Canned corn had increased in stock nearly ninety-two per cent. and had remained substantially the same in price. In a few food stuffs the prices had declined, but in nothing like the proportion in which the supply had increased. For example, the stock of canned tomatoes had increased one hundred and two per cent. and yet the price had declined only twenty-five cents per dozen cans. In some cases there had been the usual result of an increase of price following a decrease of supply, but in almost every instance the increase of price had been disproportionate to the decrease in stock.

The Attorney General has been making a careful study of the situation as a whole and of the laws that can be applied to better it and is convinced that, under the stimulation and temptation of exceptional circumstances, combinations of producers and combinations of traders have been formed for the control of supplies and of prices which are clearly in restraint of trade, and against these prosecutions will be promptly instituted and actively pushed which will in all likelihood have a prompt corrective effect. [Applause.] There is reason to believe that the prices of leather, of coal, of lumber, and of textiles have been materially affected by forms of concert and cooperation among the producers and marketers of these and other universally necessary commodities which it will be possible to redress. No watchful or energetic effort will be spared to accomplish this necessary result. I trust that there will not be many cases in which prosecution will be necessary. Public action will no doubt cause many who have perhaps unwittingly adopted illegal methods to abandon them promptly and of their own motion.

And publicity can accomplish a great deal. The purchaser can often take care of himself if he knows the facts and influences he is dealing with; and purchasers are not disinclined to do anything, either singly or collectively, that may be necessary for their self-protection. The Department of Commerce, the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Labor, and the Federal Trade Commission can do a great deal towards supplying the public, systematically and at short intervals, with information regarding the actual supply of particular commodities that is in existence and available, with regard to supplies which are in existence but not available because of hoarding, and with regard to the methods of price fixing which are being used by dealers in certain food stuffs and other necessaries. There can be little doubt that retailers are in part,—sometimes in large part,—responsible for exorbitant prices; and it is quite practicable for the Government, through the agencies I have mentioned, to supply the public with full information as to the prices at which retailers buy and as to the costs of transportation they pay, in order that it may be known just what margin of profit they are demanding. Opinion and concerted action on the part of purchasers can probably do the rest.

That is, these agencies may perform this indispensable service provided the Congress will supply them with the necessary funds to prosecute their inquiries and keep their price lists up to date. Hitherto the Appropriation Committees of the Houses have not always, I fear, seen the full value of these inquiries, and the Departments and Commissions have been very much straitened for means to render this service. That adequate funds be provided by appropriation for this purpose, and provided as promptly as possible, is one of the means of greatly ameliorating the present distressing conditions of livelihood that I have come to urge, in this attempt to concert with you the best ways to serve the country in this emergency. It is one of the absolutely necessary means, underlying many others, and can be supplied at once.

There are many other ways. Existing law is inadequate. There are many perfectly legitimate methods by which the Government can exercise restraint and guidance.

Let me urge, in the first place, that the present food control Act should be so extended both as to the period of time during which it shall remain in operation and as to the commodities to which it shall apply. Its provisions against hoarding should be made to apply not only to food but also to feed stuffs, to fuel, to clothing, and to many other commodities which are indisputably necessaries of life. As it stands now it is limited in operation to the period of the war and becomes inoperative upon the formal proclamation of peace. But I should judge that it was clearly within the constitutional power of the Congress to make similar permanent provisions and regulations with regard to all goods destined for inter-state commerce and to exclude them from inter-state shipment if the requirements of the law are not complied with. Some such regulation is imperatively necessary. The abuses that have grown up in the manipulation of prices by the withholding of food stuffs and other necessaries of life cannot otherwise be effectively prevented. There can be no doubt of either the necessity or the legitimacy of such measures. May I not call attention to the fact, also, that, although the present Act prohibits profiteering, the prohibition is accompanied by no penalty. It is clearly in the public interest that a penalty should be provided which will be persuasive.

To the same end, I earnestly recommend, in the second place, that the Congress pass a law regulating cold storage as it is regulated, for example, by the laws of the State of New Jersey, which limit the time during which goods may be kept in storage, prescribe the method of disposing of them if kept beyond the permitted period, and require that goods released from storage shall in all cases bear the date of their receipt. It would materially add to the serviceability of the law, for the purpose we now have in view, if it were also prescribed that all goods released from storage for inter-state shipment should have plainly marked upon each package the selling or market price at which they went into storage. By this means the purchaser would always be able to learn what profits stood between him and the producer or the wholesale dealer.

It would serve us a useful example to the other communities of the country, as well as greatly relieve local distress, if the Congress were to regulate all such matters very fully for the District of Columbia, where its legislative authority is without limit.

I would also recommend that it be required that all goods destined for inter-state commerce should in every case where their form or package makes it possible be plainly marked with the price at which they left the hands of the producer. Such a requirement would bear a close analogy to certain provisions of the Pure Food Act, by which it is required that certain detailed information be given on the labels of packages of foods and drugs.

And it does not seem to me that we can confine ourselves to detailed measures of this kind, if it is indeed our purpose to assume national control of the processes of distribution. I take it for granted that that is our purpose and our duty. Nothing less will suffice. We need not hesitate to handle a national question in a national way. We should go beyond the measures I have suggested. We should formulate a law requiring a federal license of all corporations engaged in interstate commerce and embodying in the license, or in the conditions under which it is to be issued, specific regulations designed to secure competitive selling and prevent unconscionable profits in the methods of marketing. Such a law would afford a welcome opportunity to effect other much needed reforms in the business of inter-state shipment and in the methods of corporations which are engaged in it; but for the moment I confine my recommendations to the object immediately in hand, which is to reduce the cost of living.

May I not add that there is a bill now pending before the Congress which, if passed, would do much to stop speculation and to prevent the fraudulent methods of promotion by which our people are annually fleeced of many millions of hard-earned money. I refer to the measure proposed by the Capital Issues Committee for the control of security issues. It is a measure formulated by men who know the actual conditions of business and its adoption would serve a great and beneficent purpose.

We are dealing, Gentlemen of the Congress, I need hardly say, with very critical and very difficult matters. We should go forward with confidence along the road we see, but we should also seek to comprehend the whole of the scene amidst which we act. There is no ground for some of the fearful forecasts I hear uttered about me, but the condition of the world is unquestionably very grave and we should face it comprehendingly. The situation of our own country, as I have said, is exceptionally fortunate. We of all peoples can afford to keep our heads and to determine upon moderate and sensible courses of action [applause] which will ensure us against the passions and distempers which are working such deep unhappiness for some of the distressed nations on the other side of the sea. But we may be involved in their distress unless we help, and help with energy and intelligence.

The world must pay for the appalling destruction wrought by the great war, and we are part of the world. We must pay our share. For five years now the industry of all Europe has been slack and disordered. The normal crops have not been produced; the normal quantity of manufactured goods has not been turned out. Not until there are the usual crops and the usual production of manufactured goods on the other side of the Atlantic can Europe return to the former conditions; and it was upon the former conditions, not the present, that our economic relations with Europe were built. We must face the fact that unless we help Europe to get back to her normal life and production a chaos will ensue there which will inevitably be communicated to this country. For the present, it is manifest, we must quicken, not slacken our own production. We, and we almost alone, now hold the world steady. Upon our steadfastness and self-possession depend the affairs of nations everywhere. It is in this supreme crisis,—this crisis for all mankind,—that America mut prove her mettle. In the presence of a world confused, distracted, she must show herself self-possessed, self-contained, capable of sober and effective action. [Applause.] She saved Europe by her action in arms; she must now save it by her action in peace. [Applause.] In saving Europe she will save herself, as she did upon the battlefields of the war. The calmness and capacity with which she deals with and masters the problems of peace will be the final test and proof of her place among the peoples of the world.

And, if only in our own interest, we must help the people over seas. Europe is our best customer. We must keep her going or thousands of our shops and scores of our mines must close. There is no such thing as letting her go to ruin without ourselves sharing in the disaster.

In such circumstances, face to face with such tests, passion must be discarded. Passion and a disregard for the rights of others have no place in the counsels of a free people. [Applause.] We need light, not heat, in these solemn times of self-examination and saving action. There must be no threats. [Applause.] Let there be only intelligent counsel, and let the best reasons win, not the strongest brute force. The world has just destroyed the arbitrary force of a military junta. It will live under no other. All that is arbitrary and coercive is in the discard. Those who seek to employ it will only prepare their own destruction. [Applause.]

We cannot hastily and over night revolutionize all the processes of our economic life, and we shall not attempt to do so. These are days of deep excitement and of extravagant speech; but with us these things are of the surface. Everyone who is in real touch with the silent masses of our great people knows that the old strong fibre and steady self-control are still there [applause], firm against violence or any distempered action that would throw their affairs into confusion. I am serenely confident that they will readily find themselves, no matter what the circumstances, and that they will address themselves to the tasks of peace with the same devotion and the same stalwart preference for what is right that they displayed to the admiration of the whole world in the midst of war. [Applause.]

And I entertain another confident hope. I have spoken to-day chiefly of measures of imperative regulation and legal compulsion, of prosecutions and the sharp correction of selfish processes; and these, no doubt, are necessary. But there are other forces that we may count on besides those resident in the Department of Justice. We have just fully awakened to what has been going on and to the influences, many of them very selfish and sinister, that have been producing high prices and imposing an intolerable burden on the mass of our people. To have brought it all into the open will accomplish the greater part of the result we seek. I appeal with entire confidence to our producers, our middlemen, and our merchants to deal fairly with the people. It is their opportunity to show that they comprehend, that they intend to act justly, and that they have the public interest sincerely at heart. And I have no doubt that housekeepers all over the country, and everyone who buys the things he daily stands in need of will presently exercise a greater vigilance, a more thoughtful economy, a more discriminating care as to the market in which he buys or the merchant with whom he trades than he has hitherto exercised.

I believe, too, that the more extreme leaders of organized labour will presently yield to a sober second thought and, like the great mass of their associates, they will think and act like true Americans. [Applause.] They will see that strikes undertaken at this critical time are certain to make matters worse, not better,—worse for them and for everybody else. The worst thing, the most fatal thing that can be done now is to stop or interrupt production or interfere with the distribution of goods by the railways and the shipping of the country. [Applause.] We are all involved in the distressing results of the high cost of living and we must unite, not divide, to correct it. There are many things that ought to be corrected in the relations between capital and labour, in respect of wages and conditions of labour and other things even more far-reaching, and I, for one, am ready to go into conference about these matters with any group of my fellow countrymen who know what they are talking about and are willing to remedy existing conditions by frank counsel rather than by violent contest. [Applause.] No remedy is possible while men are in a temper, and there can be no settlement which does not have as its motive and standard the general interest. Threats and undue insistence upon the interest of a single class make settlement impossible. [Applause.] I believe, as I have hitherto had occasion to say to the Congress, that the industry and life of our people and of the world will suffer irreparable damage if employers and workmen are to go on in a perpetual contest, as antagonists. They must, on one plan or another, be effectively associated. Have we not steadiness and self-possession and business sense enough to work out that result? Undoubtedly we have, and we shall work it out. In the meantime,—now and in the days of readjustment and recuperation that are ahead of us,—let us resort more and more to frank and intimate counsel and make ourselves a great and triumphant Nation by making ourselves a united force in the life of the world. It will not then have looked to us for leadership in vain. [Applause.]

At 4 o'clock and 39 minutes p. m. the President retired from the Hall of the House.

Thereupon the Vice President and the Members of the Senate returned to their Chamber.

The SPEAKER. The joint session is now adjourned.

REFERENCE OF THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the address of the President be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves that the address of the President be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Without objection, it will be so referred.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. VINSON, for 10 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. IRELAND, for about two weeks, on account of death in his family.

To Mr. STEVENSON (at the request of Mr. DOMINICK), for 10 days, on account of illness in his family.

RATIFICATION OF WOMAN SUFFRAGE AMENDMENT BY NEBRASKA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the secretary of state of the State of Nebraska announcing the ratification by the legislature of that State of the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to woman suffrage.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 44 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Saturday, August 9, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Postmaster General, transmitting the claim of Edward A. Purdy, postmaster at Minneapolis, Minn., for credit on account of loss by burglary, together with report of investigating inspector (H. Doc. No. 175); to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Postmaster General, transmitting claim of E. K. Eichelberger, postmaster at Hanover, Pa., for credit on account of loss by burglary, together with reports of investigating inspectors (H. Doc. No. 176); to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting estimate of appropriation to pay claim for damages by collision, river and harbor work, which has been adjusted and settled by the Chief of Engineers, United States Army (H. Doc. No. 177); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. SMITH of Idaho, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 1429) adding certain lands to the Idaho National Forest and the Payette National Forest, in the State of Idaho, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 225), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 1430) to authorize the addition of certain lands to the Weiser National Forest, Idaho, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 226), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, August 9, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father in heaven, make us wise to apprehend, willing to obey, strong to execute Thy behests, patient to wait for results.

To think, to will, to act, to accomplish is life and progress. To repine, grumble, find fault, and wait for things to turn up is to deteriorate and become a dead-weight on the body politic.

I am come, said the Master, that they might have life and that they might have it more abundantly. He lives, reigns. May we be true disciples. Amen.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

Mr. McARTHUR. Mr. Speaker, I notice all the way through the reading of the Journal the presiding officer of the Senate is alluded to as the President pro tempore. The Vice President was in the Hall yesterday performing those duties, and I ask that the Journal be corrected accordingly.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the correction will be made in accordance with the statement of the gentleman from Oregon.

There was no objection.

The Journal was approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted, as follows:

To Mr. WALTERS, indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. REAVIS, for one week, on account of illness.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for leave of absence for six weeks, to attend to important public business in Philadelphia. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania—I wish to say that it is with the greatest regret that we hear him make the request, because we all realize that the public business which he has in mind is a public business which may take him from us in the not distant future. I know that both sides of the House—even though the gentlemen on the Democratic side do not always agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania—will regret very greatly his departure from this body even temporarily. [Applause.] We will all miss him and regret his going, but we shall all feel that wherever he goes and to whatever duty he is called he will be the same honest, courageous, effective, and forceful man and public servant that he has always been in the House. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 150. Joint resolution to suspend the requirements of annual assessment work on certain mining claims during the year 1919.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills and joint resolutions:

H. R. 7110. An act extending the time for the construction of a bridge across Flint River, in the State of Georgia;

H. J. Res. 163. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of Labor to lease the Charleston immigration station and dock connected therewith;

H. J. Res. 165. Joint resolution to allow the payment of bills lawfully incurred for construction work actually performed or construction material actually purchased and delivered prior to the approval of an act approved July 11, 1919 (Public, No. 7, 66th Cong., H. R. 5227); and

H. R. 5032. An act to extend the franchise in the parishes and separate congregations of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the District of Columbia.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the President addressed the House yesterday on the very highly important question of the high cost of living. We listened to his address with attention and interest. It contained valuable information and important suggestions. The House will proceed with the consideration of the suggestions made by the President relative to those things that may require action by Congress. The President suggested the possible desirability of further appropriations. So far no estimates have reached the Congress asking for further appropriations than have already been made for the various departments of the Government. While we appropriated liberally for the Department of Justice and other law-enforcement services of the Government and only one full month of the fiscal year has elapsed, yet the Congress stands ready to promptly and carefully consider any estimates for further appropriations that may be presented, and hopes that such estimates as in the opinion of the departments of the Government are necessary and essential will be made as promptly as possible. They will be promptly and carefully considered. And I am sure that all estimates found after due consideration to be necessary for the purposes suggested will be reported on favorably and passed by the House. I reiterate, however, that as we appropriated liberally only a little more than a month ago for these services, I do not clearly understand how more funds are necessary for the present.

The President suggested legislation along certain lines, some of which is in the nature of minor amendments to laws now on the statute books. They can be passed upon quite promptly by the committees of the House. Some other suggestions are quite revolutionary in character, affecting very profoundly the policies of the Government, and they will require, of course, longer and more thorough consideration. These matters will all receive immediate consideration by the committees of the House, and will be acted upon by the House as soon as the committees shall have had time to reach a determination in regard to them. For the immediate present, however, there is nothing that the House can do, as we all understand, relative to the suggestions made by the President—nothing that could be done to-day. However, I think the House should be in session early, or at least in the middle of next week, to receive from the committees any suggestions they may have to make with regard to appropriations or legislation as suggested by the President. For to-day it has come to my attention that several gentlemen would like to address the House briefly on matters suggested by the President's message, and that some unanimous-consent requests may be submitted. My thought has been that after a program of that sort has been carried out I should make the motion to adjourn.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. My inquiry should be addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Printing, perhaps, but can the gentleman tell me what number of the President's message will be printed under the present rules of the House?

Mr. MONDELL. I am not prepared to say. Possibly some member of the Committee on Printing who is present could give us that information.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Printing, let me say that as many copies as can be printed for $500 can be printed without a special resolution being offered.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I think the number that will be printed will be the number that can be printed for $500 unless a resolution is introduced for a larger number.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. It seems to me there ought to be a fair number of copies printed.

Mr. MONDELL. The Committee on Printing, of course, can take up that matter and present a resolution at any time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The message will make a 16-page pamphlet, and 60,000 or 70,000 can be printed for less than the $500 authorization. If more copies are needed, the committee will present a resolution.

Mr. MONDELL. And the House, of course, will consider it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The universal practice has been that where it comes to no more than $500 the Committee on Printing attends to it. If it is more than $500, then it takes a special order of the House.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. SIMS. What is the order or rule of the House as to the printing of bills that may be obtained in the document room? I do not know, and I have a great many requests with regard to it.

Mr. MONDELL. As to the number to be printed?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; and placed in the document room—any particular bill—any bill. What is the rule or authority for the printing of an indefinite number of a bill?

Mr. MONDELL. I am frank to say that I am not fully informed on that subject, except that I know that it is a few hundred, and that a bill having been exhausted an additional number equal to the first print is printed, if needed, at the request of the officials of the document room.

Mr. SIMS. Is the chairman of the Committee on Printing in the House?

Mr. MONDELL. The chairman of the Committee on Printing is not here, but the gentleman from Illinois, who is well informed on everything, and better informed than I am as to the details of the printing of bills, will no doubt be able to answer accurately.

Mr. SIMS. If there is anybody else in the House except the chairman of the Committee on Printing who can tell, I would be very glad to hear.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not answer to the description——

Mr. SIMS. I agree with the description.

Mr. MANN. The number of public bills and the number of private bills are different.

Mr. SIMS. It was public bills I had reference to.

Mr. MANN. The usual number is not a large number. Three or four hundred, possibly five hundred, are printed for the House, but the Committee on Printing can order an additional number printed. That is the accustomed practice where there is a demand for a public bill and the number printed is exhausted, but the Committee on Printing can order a reprint of a bill and frequently do it; it is very common. The number so far as the law provides in the first instance is the usual number, which is not a very large number. Of private bills it is only 100.

Mr. MONDELL. And the practice is, I think, that whenever a bill is exhausted and there is a demand for it the additional number which may be authorized by the Committee on Printing is assumed to be authorized.

Mr. MANN. Where the Committee on Printing actually authorizes it on the application of the document room.

Mr. SIMS. But that only refers to one additional reprint.

Mr. MANN. But they can order another if they want to do so.

Mr. SIMS. I did not know how that was, and I have been asked in reference to it.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. RIDDICK. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on a joint resolution which I recently introduced in reference to the high cost of living.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on a resolution which he introduced in reference to the high cost of living. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman from Wyoming have five additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wyoming have five additional minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman from Wyoming yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Is it the expectation of the gentleman that if the House adjourns to-day that on Monday the business in order on the calendar for that day will be taken up, or will the House immediately adjourn?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, that would depend entirely on the judgment and desire of the House. My thought is that there is not anything particularly pressing for Monday. However, I am to be here and will be glad to have the House go on with the legislative work if gentlemen so desire. My opinion is that for the present the most important work of the Congress is in the committees. They can best dispose of the matters before them if not required to constantly attend the sessions of the House.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further? Why can not an adjournment be taken over until Tuesday or possibly Wednesday?

Mr. MONDELL. I think an adjournment might very probably be taken until Tuesday if gentlemen desire. I do not care to submit a request if there is likely to be any objection to it.

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman will yield, do we understand that there is no business on the calendar now that needs the attention of the House?

Mr. MONDELL. I think there are matters that we might very properly take up, but I do not think there is anything on the calender that is especially pressing to be taken up on Monday.

Mr. GARNER. The point I had in mind was this: We are evidently going to have to stay here this summer in continuous session until fall and maybe until December, and if the business we are going to transact, the passage of legislation, and so forth, could be taken up now and facilitated it might be possible in October or November to get an adjournment of the Congress.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman realizes that many Members had made their arrangements to go home for a short time, when we expected a five weeks' recess—the gentleman from Texas had gotten nearly home and turned around and came back [laughter and applause]—and that some Members necessarily are detained at home for a few days, and so far as those things that are not urgently pressing are concerned, it has occurred to me that they might go over for a few days, at least until those Members who have returned home have had a few days with their constituents.

Mr. GARNER. I merely wanted to get the gentleman's viewpoint. The real situation is this, if I understand it, that a great number of Members on both sides, as far as that is concerned, are absent upon the idea that they were going to have a five-weeks' recess——

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. And made their arrangements accordingly. It is inconvenient and sometimes impossible for them to return at such times, and for the lack of that number of Members, or, rather, to suit their convenience, it is better for the House to adjourn over until Tuesday or Wednesday, or some other day.

Mr. MONDELL. That is true—to Tuesday at least. I think that is fair to absent Members on both sides. Of course, in the meantime committees will be at work on the questions suggested by the President's message.

Mr. GARNER. I think it is a little unjust for the House to take up business of importance now when Members are absent and can not get back.

Mr. MONDELL. As a matter of fact, as we have no estimates now before us—I do not know when we shall have them—and as it will take the committees some days to pass on any of the suggestions made by the President, there would be no delay in the public business now deemed most urgent if the House adjourned until Tuesday and then until Friday.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman means in what he says as to the reference of public business the public business suggested by the President. There are a lot of things on the calendar that ought to be attended to, and as long as you convey the idea to absent Members to adjourn until Tuesday and then until Friday we will never get to any business here.

Mr. MONDELL. My thought is, following exactly the line of the thought of the gentleman from Texas, that very soon we must get down to regular sessions. I have the same thought that the gentleman from Texas has.

Mr. GARNER. Do you not think it would be advisable, the gentleman being the leader of the majority, to let it be understood by the absent Members that they should hasten here as quickly as possible? If you are not going to undertake to pass legislation, I think it is a little unfair to those who are here. The gentleman mentioned myself. I traveled 2,000 miles. I awoke in the morning and saw that the President had said that Congress should not adjourn, and that the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], in response to that, had offered a resolution canceling the vacation. So I got on the train and came back. I say if you have got 200 and more people here now waiting for the transaction of business the absent Members ought to use every effort to get back here and allow us to transact business.

Mr. MONDELL. I agree entirely with the gentleman. My thought is that not only should we take up the matters the President has suggested to us but other important matters now on the calendar very soon. The committees will be considering the matters presented by the President at once, the House as soon as the committees can act.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will yield.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the House could remain in session 24 hours in the day for 7 days in the week. It is a wonder that some gentlemen have not proposed that in order to expedite public business. But we all know it would not expedite public business and it would not make for good legislation. And it will not make for good legislation now to attempt to keep the House here all the summer, all the fall, and all next winter and next summer. It is not for the interest of the country to have that done, no matter how seriously gentlemen may take the legislation.

The work now before the House is mainly the work of committees. It would be a good thing if most of the Members would take a trip away from Washington for a while and get rested up and their souls eased up. Of course, those who are here sometimes feel that everybody else ought to be here. I can understand the feeling of the gentleman who has been called back 1,000 miles. He thinks everybody ought to have come with him.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. I distinctly asserted that I did not criticize anybody who did not return; but I say this, and I repeat it, that when you have got a majority of Congress here and daily waiting for the transaction of the business of the country, that business being those bills that are on the calendar, it seems to me there ought to be some effort to impress those who are absent that they ought to return here and help transact business.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, there will always be bills on the calendar. There are always bills on the calendar when final adjournment comes. If we could wind up all the legislation in the world forever by sitting here a few days, I would be in favor of doing it, but I have learned through experience that that can not be done. A majority of the Members of the House were not here last week. They came back in order to make a quorum in order that the President might be heard. But if you proceed now I am not going to stay here, so far as I am concerned, unless you keep a Sergeant at Arms bringing me back. I will stay here during the cool days. I am going home now. If Congress wants to meet, I am perfectly willing. I do not expect to be here then for a while, not before next winter. But I know from experience and observation that Congress will do better work if it takes a recess of some sort, either implied or agreed, during the summer months, and give Members an opportunity to go home or somewhere else for a while. "Chicken feed" is now on the calendar, and that is all. "Chicken feed" can be disposed of or wasted and no great loss to the country.

Mr. SIMS. I want to say to the gentleman that some of these bills are not "chicken feed," although some people might be glad if they were. For instance, there is a bill to return to the Interstate Commerce Commission and the State commissions power to suspend rates made by the President, which has been reported by the committee.

Mr. MANN. I think that is about as near "chicken feed" as anything can be.

Mr. SIMS. I am glad to have the judgment of a man who I think is so capable of passing judgment as is the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. It is absolutely unimportant whether it is passed now or not. If it were passed there would be nothing done about it for months. It would probably be years before a decision would be reached by the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is not essential, in my judgment.

Mr. SIMS. I made the same argument in committee and could not get a majority of the members to follow me.

Mr. MANN. It is unimportant that we should spend 5 hours or 10 hours or 24 hours a day on the floor of the House. I think we had better take a rest. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, we might as well recognize the condition we are in. It is perfectly apparent to the old-timers here that we are stuck. [Laughter.] We are probably stuck until December.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I would like to hear what the ex-Speaker is saying. Let him turn around and face this side.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. All right. We shall probably be here until this time next year. We may take a short vacation just before the 1st of December for prudential reasons. [Laughter.] Now, that being the case, I am going to notify every Democrat in the House by telegraph to come back here just as quick as he can. [Applause.] I think we ought to go on with the business.

The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has a celebrated bill pending here for the good of the soldiers. We all want to help the soldiers. That bill has been on the calendar now for a week or so.

Mr. SIMS. "Chicken feed!"

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] suggests that that is "chicken feed." I do not think it is "chicken feed." [Laughter.] I think this House ought to do at once, or as quickly as it can, anything that it can do for the benefit of the soldiers who fought in this Great War, and who were in it.

Whether the Mondell bill is the panacea or not, I do not know, but I do know that some of us will stay here. Mr. MONDELL and myself took a good deal of trouble to get a quorum here yesterday. We telegraphed everybody and wrote everybody, and did everything we could. Of course, we did not pay any attention to people who live west of the Mississippi. They could not get here. Next to the St. Louis Members, I live closer to Washington than any other Missourian in Congress. If I make close connection in St. Louis—just a few minutes—I can get home in 30 hours; if not, in two days. For the rest of them it takes longer than that. But those of us who stay here are entitled to have business transacted, so that if possible we can get away from here and have a month or two of vacation in the fall. [Applause.]

It is practically a waste of time to come here every morning and go through a performance somewhat similar to this of to-day and get nowhere. I know enough about the business of this House to know this—and if the Speaker does not know it now he will find it out—that when this Congress is coming to a conclusion there will be a great hullabaloo here and a great rush to get recognition, and everybody will be in a bad humor, and the legislation will be done in a slipshod way. There is no question in the world about that. This business has got to be transacted. By the time the gentleman from Wyoming can get his bill up about drainage, irrigation, cut-over lands, and all that, why then perhaps the gentleman from Tennessee, Brother SIMS, will have him a bill ready. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. What I said a moment ago about the Mondell bill being "chicken feed" was, of course, ironically spoken, because I thought the gentleman from Wyoming himself was treating his own bill as "chicken feed." [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. You ought to mark it "ironical." [Laughter.] The Mondell bill will take a good deal of discussion. There is no question about that. There are half a dozen theories up in the air about what we should try to do for the soldiers. Some of them are somewhat in line with the ideas of the gentleman from Wyoming, and some of them very radically different.

Now, the gentleman from Wyoming said that there were some gentlemen sitting around here who wanted to make speeches to-day. I hope they will not. [Laughter.] But if you will get up the Mondell bill and allow a proper time for discussion, all these men who have speeches in their systems can work them out under general debate, and I think we ought to go to work. I am not objecting to adjourning to-day.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I might also say that there are half a dozen bills reported from the Committee on Ways and Means that may take from three days to a week to dispose of.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, the longer they are put off, the better off the country will be. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, it is well not to become excited because of the weather—the weather outside or the political weather. The last Congress, closing its session on the 4th of March, under the leadership of one of the most able members of the Committee on Appropriations that I ever served with, Mr. Sherley, passed through the House, after great consideration and inquiry upon all the estimates that were submitted, the bills that it had charge of. They went to the Senate and failed. Then came the special session, beginning on the 19th of May, when the House organized and the Congress organized. A new Committee on Appropriations did strenuous work and good work, substantially taking the bills that the House had passed in its last session, and which failed in the Senate, reporting them with increases. A deluge of supplemental estimates came in until the hammer came down after they were passed. Under the leadership of another able chairman of that committee, with an able committee, both of the majority and minority, we prepared and recommended to the House, under the leadership of the chairman, the bills that were enacted, caring for the past fiscal year by way of deficiency, together with some things that were not strictly deficiencies, and providing for the present fiscal year. The Department of Justice was amply provided for, and it was the duty of that department to enforce the laws with its great machinery, and it did not lack for money then and does not lack for money now to perform efficiently its function. It was not stinted. Well, it went along, and there was no great excitement, no great hurry, no threat on the part of any organizations. Oh, it is not pleasant for me to think about threats. If the House will pardon me, I voted for the bill that was passed under threat. God knows I will never vote for another one that is passed under threat. [Applause.] I am not proud of my vote on that bill, though I had plenty of company. It was on the eve of the movement of the crops. Much legislation, most valuable legislation, that had been recommended was postponed until the next regular session, and while it was recommended it slept and slept from that day to this. Now, the fiscal year has just begun to run. The appropriations for the fiscal year are available. Only a little over a month and nine days of this fiscal year have elapsed. The laws on the statute books could have been enforced and can be enforced now; but things are springing up under stress, and we are going to attend to the high cost of living. That is important, but it is no more important now than it was three months ago or six months ago.

Now, I am a member of the Committee on Appropriations. I want to say to you, as our leader upon this side [Mr. MONDELL] stated, no estimates have been made since the beginning of this fiscal year for deficiencies or other appropriations, but later the estimates will come. They will be originated by the heads of divisions, by the heads of bureaus, by the heads of various departments, and forwarded by the Secretary of the Treasury. They will—

Come as the winds come when navies are stranded.

In my opinion there is law upon the statute books that covers the present emergency—all the war measures touching food and touching the high cost of living—under which plenary power is lodged with the Executive, and money has been appropriated to enforce the laws.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. May I have a minute longer?

Mr. WALSH, Mr. SMITH of Michigan, and Mr. FESS asked unanimous consent that Mr. CANNON's time be extended five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. In my opinion, with the war-time laws still in force, with appropriations to carry them out, with the fiscal year only a little more than a month begun, there is no necessity for immediate appropriations. The appropriations are available. Only 1 months' appropriations have been used and there are 11 months more of the fiscal year.

Now, I am not seeking to make a political speech. I am referring to the present situation. It goes without saying that, in my judgment, the snow will fly before this session of Congress will close. I am not grumbling about that. It is our duty to be here when it is necessary, and we ought to perform our duty as Members of the House, because revenue measures and appropriation bills originate with us, and while this House is a great body, with 435 Members, we go back to the country every two years to be turned up or turned down, as the case may be.

So we should be careful. Now, I do not know how many additional estimates may come in. I have referred to that before and will not speak of it further. I have no promise to make. As one Member with one vote, I will be here, and that vote will be cast according to my judgment, and in my old age without fear of anybody except Him who holds the universe in His hands, and I do not fear Him, but I have great reverence for Him. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, lest we forget, and in order to keep the record straight, since the Adamson bill has been made a target of attack, yesterday by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] and again to-day by the gentleman who has just spoken [Mr. CANNON], I want to make a few remarks. I voted for that bill when it passed. I have no apologies or excuses now for having voted for it. I want to put in the RECORD now a succinct statement of the conditions prevailing at that time. There was great turmoil in the country—in the words of the President, a "very grave situation." The railroad trainmen had been in a controversy for more than a year with their employers and had some months before that time fixed a date when they were going to vote on the question of a strike. They had grievances which they had sought in vain to have settled. The President, having in view the welfare of the whole country, in order to avoid a condition which would have been in his judgment a public calamity, sent for the owners of the railroads and the trainmen to come and see him and talk with him. Both parties came and conversed with the President, and after that conversation the President formulated a plan which in his judgment might be a just basis of settlement. He called on both parties. The railroad owners refused to accept the plan. The railroad men agreed to accept it. In this condition the day of strike was fast approaching.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. If I can get a little more time.

Mr. BLACK. Just for one question at that point.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I presume my time will be extended if necessary.

Mr. BLACK. Does not the gentleman know that the owners of the railroads offered and agreed to arbitrate the disputed questions by arbitrators to be appointed by the President?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I think the gentleman is mistaken. I know he was one of the Members who voted against the Adamson bill.

Mr. BLACK. I was. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I think the gentleman is mistaken now, because in the campaign that followed I investigated the whole matter and I found that the railroad owners had disagreed and refused to accept the proposition submitted by the President, while the men agreed to accept it. In his message to Congress, August 29, 1916, the President declared: "The representatives of the brotherhoods accepted the plan"—that is, the plan of the President—"but the representatives of the railroads declined to accept." Then the President recommended a law in the nature of the Adamson bill, which was formulated by the leaders of the Democratic Party in the committee, perhaps in consulation with the leaders of the other party. It came before Congress. Two great men were candidates for the Presidency of the United States while that bill was pending. One of them had recommended it. The other one was silent. The leader of the opposition party was silent and remained silent until the bill was passed, though he might have reached his own party leaders here by wire. The bill was passed by a vote of 236 to 50. Strong leaders of the Republicans as well as strong leaders of the Democrats, a majority of the Republican Party, if I am not mistaken, voted for the bill, as well as nearly a solid Democratic vote.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the genteman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I can give the gentleman the exact figures on that vote—239 for the bill and 56 against the bill on the final passage.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. That is correct. I thank the gentleman. I think there were only two Democrats against it, and a substantial majority of the Republicans, including their former Speaker [Mr. CANNON], who has not generally been accused of lacking courage, voted for the bill.

God hates a coward, but I doubt if He has any regard for the hero who, far away from the battle front or long after the issue, asperses those who bore the burden and responsibility of duty.

It is easy to criticize the action taken when a great emergency is passed, but the men who are so quick to criticize after the action are the very men who would have acted as we did during the occasion.

Mr. POU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. POU. If it was such a colossal blunder, why does not the majority party repeal it now? They have it in their power to do so.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. That very point I had noted to refer to. I am glad the gentleman does not let me forget it. The law has been on the statute books for nearly three years. The Republican Congress has been in session for three months. Not a single bill, so far as I know, not even one by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], my colleague, has ever been introduced into this House asking to repeal the Adamson law. I have defended it all over this land because I believe that for the trainmen of this country an eight-hour day is essential to the safety of the traveling public as well as for the welfare of the men. [Applause.] But here comes a man from my State and charges this great Congress with truckling to a threat, with a disgraceful surrender of right and justice, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] this morning begs pardon for having surrendered. I say that it is now time for some one who knows the facts to restate them for the RECORD. The law stands to-day, and he is a bold man and a foolish man who would dare to offer to repeal it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Those who criticize that as a base surrender found most of their criticism upon the charge that we yielded to the demands of the trainmen and gave them time and a half for overtime. As a matter of fact the act provided only for pro rata pay for overtime.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I am very glad the gentleman has called my attention to that fact. They say that Congress surrendered under a threat of strike at the demand of the railroad men. I deny that. I say we passed a wise and just law, at a time when it saved the country from a national calamity, under the leadership of a great President who loved his country well enough to be willing to face the criticisms and taunts and aspersions of those who attacked his courage then or who may attack it now. A great policy is involved. Who is here so reckless as to say that railroad men have not the right to strike to better their condition? Who will say that they did anything illegal in proposing to call a strike? They made no demand on Congress. The President made the only demand. They said that, acting within their rights, they proposed if evils were not corrected to order a strike. Evils were not corrected.

The President of the United States, looking to the welfare of the whole country, came to the front and suggested a plan for settlement, and when the railroad owners refused to accept the suggestion and the railroad men agreed to it no demand was made on Congress by the railroad men, but the President came to Congress, asking Congress to pass this law. The men stood on their rights, and if passing that law was truckling to a threat, then every just settlement made between labor and capital through the instrumentalities of the Government when the parties to the controversy are about to precipitate a ruinous calamity is truckling surrender to labor. I hold no brief for labor. I hold no brief for capital. I do hold a brief for the great American people, whose interests and welfare were involved in the condition that existed in 1916. [Applause.] Every great city in the land was on tiptoe, fearful that its transportation would be tied up by the struggle between the parties to the contest. Capital sat in the saddle, having all it wanted; labor was demanding something; capital refused. That was the condition when the President, and then Congress, stepped in to protect the interests of all the people of the United States.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. BLACK. I want to ask the gentleman this question: Does he not remember that at the time the President submitted the Adamson law, or, rather, a suggestion for the Adamson law, he suggested four other measures, some of them being for the interest and benefit of the public, and that Congress adopted only one, to wit, the one for the benefit of the employees, and nothing whatever has been done toward the adoption of the others? [Applause.]

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The gentleman is now rehashing the campaign criticisms made by the Republican leaders after we passed the law. There were other measures suggested by the President at the same time, and we may have been, and may be still, derelict in not passing them. If so, let us pass them now. In my campaign discussion I did not go into what other measures submitted by the President ought to have been passed. I concerned myself only with the right or the wrong of that Adamson law at the time it passed. I defend it as wise and right now. And I say that the men who attack us as truckling for passing that law ought to propose to repeal or to amend it today, and they do not dare do it. No; you seem to complain because from the gristmill of legislation there was ground out only one bill from three or four bills. If other and further wise legislation was suggested by the President, why do not gentlemen use their great ability and genius to propose and pass it? But let us get back to the Adamson law.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. What is there of the Adamson law to repeal?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. There is nothing that ought to be repealed.

Mr. CANNON. What is there? It is past.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. And there is nothing that the gentleman from Illinois who apologized a moment ago for which he ought to apologize in voting for it.

Mr. CANNON. That is a matter of my opinion as to my action, just as the gentleman acts according to his opinion.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. And the gentleman will admit that whatever the conditions are a Member of Congress ought to vote for a law that is right in his opinion. The Adamson law in effect is the eight-hour day applied to the trainmen of the United States, and it ought to have been in force before that time, and is in force now and will remain in force.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask that he may have five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that his colleague may proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman has stated that the Adamson law is an eight-hour day. Now, the gentleman recognizes that when the law was passed a commission was created to investigate the whole subject and report back. I believe Gen. Goethals was chairman of that commission.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. It was part of the law.

Mr. BLACK. Does not that report show that there has been no shortening in the hours of labor of the railroads [applause], and that there has been no real eight-hour day put in effect, and that in truth and in fact it was only a wage-increase bill? [Applause.]

Mr. HARDY of Texas. What the commission may have reported I do not know and do not care. It was unquestionably a wage increase per hour, being a shortening of the standard of a day's labor with no lessening of the day's wage. If labor had had no demand which capital resisted, there would have been no struggle. There was a struggle. This law settled it, and as it has proved satisfactory to both parties since then it is a wise law. [Applause.] And neither the gentleman from Texas who has addressed me nor the one who criticized all Congress yesterday has had the nerve to offer a bill to repeal that law.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The vice of the Adamson law is the acceding to threats and not the substance of the law itself.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The gentleman heard me say the railroad organization of railroad men did not make any demand on Congress.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, the people of the United States know it if the gentleman from Texas does not.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. No; and the gentleman from Texas who addresses me does not know it. I know the facts, and they are as I have stated.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Is not this a fact, that the Adamson law was a compromise suggested by the President? The railroad men finally yielded. They demanded time and a half pay for overtime. They contended the eight-hour day without the time and a half overtime to penalize the railroads would not give any relief. Then the railroad men finally yielded. Congress did not yield, but they yielded. Then the railway executives refused to yield to the demands of the President and the President came to Congress, and we made the railroad executives agree to the President's demand. It is not Congress yielding to the railroad men.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. That is about what I stated in the beginning of my remarks. Perhaps the gentleman was not present. The controversy was on. The President sent for both parties. They both came to him and talked to him. He studied the situation, he devised a plan for settlement, and said here is a wise and just solution for both. The railroad men accepted it and the employers refused and rejected it. Then the President came to Congress and truckled, if you call it so, by proposing this Adamson law. In my judgment he acted for the best interest of the country, and yet three years afterwards the man who professes to worship the shadow of Woodrow Wilson charges me and all Democrats in Congress and a majority of the Republicans as being truckling servants to the will of the laboring men. [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I will.

Mr. WALSH. Is it not a fact that before the bill was passed by Congress that an order to strike had been issued by the officials of the labor organization of the railroads?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. If the gentleman had listened—I stated in the beginning that before the President took the matter up of the differences between labor and capital, the employers and employees had reached an acute stage. The country was trembling in the balance of a strike. A vote was being taken or had been taken; a day was fixed. An effort was made by the President then, as Theodore Roosevelt made in the mining controversy, to get labor and capital together, and not succeeding, he called each one of them to his office. He talked with them, got their point of view, and afterwards made a proposition which in his own mind was just to both, and submitted it to each of them. The employees agreed to accept it; the employers refused, and held the country in their grasp.

Mr. WALSH. I had not heard the gentleman state that.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. No; that was a fact.

This whole question was thrashed out in 1916. Mr. Hughes, who sat silent while the measure was being discussed, after the President's message of August 29, and until it was approved by the President, opened up with the same line of attack made yesterday by my colleague [Mr. BLANTON]. It was his chief attack on Mr. Wilson in his tour from the Atlantic to the Pacific. And yet, when challenged to say whether he would try to repeal the law if elected, he gave no definite reply.

In the President's message he suggested also the following:

> Fifth, an amendment of the existing Federal statute which provides for the mediation, conciliation, and arbitration of such controversies as the present by adding to it a provision that in case the methods of accommodation now provided for should fail, a full public investigation of the merits of every such dispute shall be instituted and completed before a strike or lockout may lawfully be attempted.

Congress seems even yet stalled on the proposition contained in this suggestion. I very much favor some such legislation. I realize that compulsory arbitration is contrary to the genius and spirit of our people. To enforce it against the employee would be equivalent to slavery, if it could be enforced. To enforce it against capital would be confiscation. The suggestion of the President is not compulsory arbitration, but it is a prohibition against hasty and arbitrary action by either organized labor or by capital, and would, I think, prove in practice salutary and beneficial to both capital and labor. At any rate, Congressmen ought to be constructive and not simply critical.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, may I make a parliamentary inquiry just at this point, if the gentleman will yield to me? I came into the Chamber a little after the beginning of the session, and I would like to know what other addresses have been agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Nothing. This is all by unanimous consent.

Mr. BLACK. There was no understanding as to addresses? I desired to know.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I inquire how long this field day is going to go on?

The SPEAKER. It depends upon the consent of the House, of course.

Mr. GARD. I desire to ask what is the purpose of the leader of the majority as to the time when the House shall adjourn this afternoon. I do not desire to object——

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Kansas has asked to proceed for 10 minutes.

Mr. GARD. I am making inquiry as to the purpose of the majority leader.

Mr. MONDELL. There seem to be gentlemen on both sides who desire to discuss questions of interest to the country. It has occurred to me that it is just as well to continue the discussion for a time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know on what subject?

Mr. TINCHER. On the high cost of living.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Just one moment, Mr. Speaker. I have no objection to the gentleman talking on any live issue that is affecting the people to-day, but I do not believe that this is any place to discuss political bunk like we are doing to-day. I think the things the country is interested in are matters ahead of us, not like the Adamson law and others that are past, and I shall object in the future. I do not object to the gentleman discussing matters of live interest, such as the high cost of living, but I shall object to any discussion of political bunk by any man on either side.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. You might do well to make that suggestion while the administration is being shelled instead of doing it now.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I object to a rehashing of politics.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any quarrel among the Members of Congress now as to the policies of legislation demanded by threat. I do not care whether we have ever had such legislation or not, I am glad to see such a unanimous sentiment, voicing apparently the sentiment of the President of the United States as expressed here, to the effect that, if we ever did have, we will not have any more of that kind of legislation.

The President in mentioning the high cost of living yesterday, called attention to the fact that the Food Administration would be called upon to keep the price of wheat down. I come from a wheat-growing district. I was glad to hear the President say to this Congress and the United States that wheat was one commodity, one food product, that the United States had actually regulated the price of and kept down. I was glad to hear him say yesterday to this Congress that wheat to-day is cheaper in the United States than in Europe, and with proper management he hopes to keep it that way.

There never was a time since this Congress fixed the price of wheat but that the fixing of that price has operated to cheapen wheat in the hands of the farmer. There has never been a time since the Government fixed the guaranteed price of wheat but what the farmer's wheat would have been worth more if it had not been for that guaranty. I am glad that matter has finally been straightened out so that it will not be expected any more that the Government made a suitable price for it. Everybody knows if it was not for a fixed price of wheat to-day wheat would be selling for $4 a bushel.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Was it not due to the fact that the Representatives of the wheat-growing sections of the country urged the original wheat-pricing bill?

Mr. TINCHER. I think that is true of some of the States, but not at that price.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. And they asked for the fixing of $2-a-bushel price at that time. Did not the same Representatives here at last session urge the bill to guarantee that by the passage of a billion-dollar appropriation bill?

Mr. TINCHER. I was not here at either of the sessions, and I can not answer. I do want to say this, that I am glad there has never been occasion for the President or anyone else to say to any other producing section of the United States that he is glad to see that the price of their product is cheaper in the United States than in Europe, and that he intends to keep it so.

Mr. CANDLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINCHER. Not for a moment. I want to explain something about profiteering in wheat products.

Mr. CANDLER. I want to explain where that came from and why it was fixed.

Mr. TINCHER. I want to say that I sympathize with the President in his proposed prosecution of the profiteer. I called attention, in my feeble way, to the fact that for more than a year before I came here the profiteer was running rampant in the milling business in my district. I called attention to the fact that at the fixed price of wheat, the maximum price the miller was permitted to pay for wheat, the number of pounds of wheat he was permitted to use in a barrel of flour, and at the price of flour, the miller could not make more than 25 cents a barrel on flour. The food department of the United States sent auditors into my district and audited the books. I have one milling company in my district that they say owed this Government $282,000 of excess profits. Well, all of them together, I think, owe a million. Without reauditing those books, without sending another man to look at the books, the milling company sent their attorney here to Washington, and he compromised with the Grain Corporation. I do not know where they get jurisdiction to settle those matters. I do not know whether they turned it over to the Department of Justice or not, but they compromised for $8,000 and went home with their receipt in full. I say to you that if the Department of Justice is sincere about enforcing the law against profiteering, they ought to have enforced that law, and that that conduct on their part was simply encouraging profiteering, and that that policy having been pursued by the department is partly accountable for the profiteering.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINCHER. I will.

Mr. GARNER. If I caught the gentleman's statement correctly, it was that an inspector of the Treasury Department investigated the books of this milling company and ascertained that they owed them $282,000 of income tax?

Mr. TINCHER. No, sir.

Mr. GARNER. Excess-profits tax?

Mr. TINCHER. No, sir; that they had profiteered to that extent. The profit the miller could make on a barrel was 25 cents a barrel.

Mr. GARNER. If I caught the gentleman's remarks, they were to the effect that they had $282,000 profit, on which they owed——

Mr. TINCHER. Not profit.

Mr. GARNER. Well, what was it?

Mr. TINCHER. They had profiteered above the limit fixed by the Government that much money. They had taken that much money, and your department here settled without my consent or the consent of anyone else for $8,000, and the figures are in the department to show it. I claim, first, that the Grain Corporation or the Food Administration had no right to assume the responsibility for the Government of the United States to settle that; and I claim, second, that the Department of Justice of the United States that permits those things to go on from time to time comes in here at this late date and says that they will prosecute the profiteers if they can arrange with Congress for additional appropriation. [Applause.]

Now, I want to call your attention to something else. I want to tell you how it happened that I got to investigating this matter. The 1st day of July this year I began to receive telegrams, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] has got, no doubt, some on the same subject, about the price of cattle, and I went with some Senators—Senator CAPPER, Senator KENDRICK, and Congressman HOMER HOCH—and others to the Department of Agriculture to talk about that proposition. There was a prevalent sentiment in the country to the effect that we were doing a patriotic thing if we did not even eat meat, and the cattlemen, who were being ruined by the reduction of the price of cattle, were begging for publicity on that question, to make it plain to the people that there was no longer a ban on the eating of meat. They were asking the Department of Agriculture to give publicity to that fact.

We found, when we got to the department, the Bureau of Markets in conference with the officials of the Department of Agriculture, and the gentleman in charge of that bureau had procured the preparation of an article to which they were going to give publicity, in which they were going to say that the packers of the United States were entirely blameless in this instance. I said, "How do you get at that result that the packers in this instance are blameless?" The head of the Bureau of Markets—I could never find out yet who is the head of that bureau, but the man who held himself out as being the head of that bureau—said: "On the figures from Buffalo, St. Louis, Chicago, and Cincinnati, and everywhere, showing that while they reduced the price of your steer 5 cents a pound, they reduced the price of the carcass 5 cents a pound to the people." I said: "You are going to say, in the face of that, that the packers are absolutely blameless? Let us talk a minute. On the 1st day of March the steer was worth $60 more than he is to-day, selling at 5 cents less a pound. The packer claimed he only wanted to make $1.60 on that steer. They are selling the carcass of 800 pounds to-day for $40 less than on the 1st day of March, 5 cents a pound. If he was making $1.60 on the 1st day of March, he is making $21.60 to-day, and here is the Bureau of Markets, which is supposed to help the consumer and producer, putting out publicity to the effect that the packer is manifestly fair." [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. TINCHER. I want to give credit where credit is due. They changed that publicity circular and said "the packer was manifestly unfair." [Laughter.] That was the way the article went out. [Renewed laughter.]

Here is what happened: The packers had their cold-storage plants filled with that cheap meat, and they had the choice, when the publicity came, either of raising the price of steers a little or reducing the price of meat. Of course they had too much meat on hand to reduce the price of meat, and they put $20 a head on the steer. And then the packers protested against the unfairness of the publicity that came from the Department of Agriculture. I tell you that there was not one of the boys except those who were up there that got any meaning from that circular letter as to what the unfairness of that publicity was.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINCHER. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman seems to have a good deal of information concerning packing——

Mr. TINCHER. Very little——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. And the shortage of foodstuffs. I have noticed from the agricultural papers and the bulletins and the newspapers for the last 10 or 15 years that millions and millions of goats have been killed. No one ever heard of a goat coming out of one of these packing houses. They all come out as "lambs" or remain there. Has anybody any information as to how many goats are in there, and how many came out as "lambs"? [Laughter.]

Mr. TINCHER. No. I would not know a goat from a guinea.

Mr. McARTHUR. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, I want to say to the gentleman from Kentucky that he can settle this question by examining the carcass. The tail of the sheep sticks down, while the tail of the goat sticks up. [Laughter.]

Mr. TINCHER. I want to encourage the Department of Justice if that department really wants to investigate these profiteers. If they want to, they can. The President yesterday placed the stamp of his approval on our Federal Trade Commission. He mentioned that as one of the branches of the Government that he approved of. Well, on July 27, 1918, the Federal Trade Commission reported to the President and the Congress the condition with reference to the packers and the condition with reference to profiteering. I will not attempt to read that report. You are all familiar with it. There is no doubt the Department of Justice has been familiar with it, and there is no doubt that all the departments of Government have been familiar with it. But I want to say now, although I do not want to say anything that will discourage them when they say they are going after them fearlessly, but is it not a long time to wait to ask for an appropriation from June, 1918, to August, 1919, after having received the figures from the department of the Government appointed by himself and having his approval at this time? [Applause on the Republican side.]

I do not want to cause any trouble to anyone, but I say to you that I believe that there is some one in the department who, after all this time, complacently thinks he could settle $282,000 claims for $8,000. I think anybody who investigates it would find not only that one milling company compromised but that they all practically compromised, and practically all on the same basis. I wonder how many Congressmen here ever stopped to think that the farmer is not receiving to-day in Kansas, for wheat that makes better flour than you get in Washington, over $1.75 a bushel?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINCHER. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman has made a statement that I confess I am ignorant about. I think an investigation ought to be made if the statements are, as I understand them, from the Government. I understood, first, that he owed the Government $282,000, and that the Government settled for $8,000.

Mr. TINCHER. Let me explain that.

Mr. GARNER. I hope the gentleman will explain it.

Mr. TINCHER. The Government said to him, "You are making flour. You can only make a profit of 25 cents a barrel. All above that goes to the Government." The Food Administration said that. The Food Administration was authorized by Congress to say that. Now, the Food Administration sent their auditors to that mill and the auditors reported that the books showed that the mill owed the Government $282,000.

Mr. GARNER. Do I understand that where a man made a greater profit than that the Food Administration required him to turn it over to the Government?

Mr. TINCHER. What was he to do with it?

Mr. GARNER. I do not know. I am asking the gentleman.

Mr. TINCHER. Somebody was profiteering. He turned over $8,000 to the Grain Corporation. I do not know whether they turned it over to the Government or not.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TINCHER. I should like to have two minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that his time be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARNER. I did not know that the Government received any revenue out of the Food Administration act. Do I understand the gentleman to say——

Mr. TINCHER. Wait. I do not want the gentleman to take all my time. The Grain Corporation took this $8,000, that I know about, and I understand that is one department of this administration.

Mr. HAUGEN. The report states that millers were making a profit of 13½ cents on each barrel of flour for the four years ending June 30, 1916, and that under Food Administration regulations limiting their profits to 25 cents per barrel maximum they were making 45 cents a barrel, which was three times the normal profit per barrel referred to. Before the regulation their average profit was 13½ cents.

Mr. TINCHER. When I hear the Department of Justice and when I hear this Grain Corporation and some of the other high-up officials proclaiming what they are going to do to the profiteers I am reminded of the old saying that what they are speaks so much louder than what they say that you can not hear them. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACK. I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, our esteemed colleague, Judge HARDY, took occasion awhile ago to make some remarks on the bill passed in September, 1916, commonly known as the Adamson law. As I construed his address it was a defense of his own position as to the passage of that law and an attack upon those Members who voted against it.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. BLACK. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Certainly I did not charge them with truckling, or attack them in any manner. I was defending those of us who voted for it, who were attacked on yesterday as having truckled.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman gives an interpretation to his own remarks to which I do not exactly agree. I do not mean to say that the gentleman in any offensive manner criticized his colleagues who voted against the Adamson law, but the substance of his address was a severe indictment of those of us who did not see fit to vote for that law. I have never on the floor of this House criticized any Member who voted for that law.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I want to say that I have not the slightest criticism of any gentleman whose judgment permitted him to vote against that law.

Mr. BLACK. I am very glad to have the gentleman say that.

Now, in regard to the circumstances of the passage of the Adamson law, I recall and can not forget that at the time the situation came up the President of the United States submitted to us six propositions, none of which were embodied in the Adamson bill except those which took care of the demands of the employees. Why? Because the advocates of that law said, "A strike has been threatened and has been called for next Monday morning, and the orders for it have been sent out by the brotherhood chiefs, and we have no opportunity to take up more than one feature of the President's recommendation, to wit, the eight-hour feature, which will make it obligatory upon the carriers to pay to each employee engaged in any capacity in the operation of trains for 8 hours' service what he is now receiving for 10 hours' service." In other words, a wage-increase bill. So the leaders in charge of the legislation said, "We will take up these other propositions recommended by the President later on, but we can not take them up now." Now, when that appeal was made to me as a Member of this House, feeling that the then existing danger was a proposition that was bound to confront us again in the future, I said, "No; I will not vote for a bill that deals with only one feature and ignores the others," and I did not vote for it. [Applause.] I stated at that time my reasons why I did not vote for it. With your indulgence I will restate them and will read from a statement which I issued at the time and which was published in the Dallas Morning News of September 2, 1916, and in which I said: "I voted against the Adamson bill because, in my opinion, the bill does not deal in a comprehensive and adequate manner with the situation that confronts the country." If the measures suggested by the President in his address to both Houses of Congress had been embodied in the measure I would have supported it.

While I did not agree in its entirety with all the program suggested by the President in his address to Congress, still I think it was broad in its conception and would have adequately met the situation not only for the present, but would have provided safety for the future. I was emphatically opposed to taking up just one phase of the matter and rushing through hasty and ill-considered legislation merely because of the threat of a strike held over the heads of Congress.

I refuse to be coerced and intimidated by the employees who were threatening to strike, just as I would refuse to be coerced and intimidated by the railroads.

I am ready at any time to approach the whole problem in a legislative way, with a view of doing absolute justice to the railroads, the employees, and the general public, who are themselves vitally concerned.

Then here is what I said in conclusion:

The problem is bound to be met at some time in the future, and why not now? I believe in not only providing for the immediate present, but making it impossible for a situation of this kind to arise again in the future.

[Applause.]

If Congress had proceeded then with a constructive, legislative program, in all probability we would not be confronted with the present situation. I do not mean to say this in a harsh, critical sense as to those who were willing to pass the Adamson law with only its features meeting the employees' demand and letting those affecting the public's interest wait. But what I do say is: That a mistake was made, and I said so at the time.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT. In order to make the history complete Congress adjourned within a few days after the passage of this act, and when it returned for the short session—I do not want to trespass too much upon the gentleman's time, but I think this is important——

Mr. BLACK. Oh, probably I can get an extension. I am always glad to have the gentleman from Tennessee make an observation in my time.

Mr. GARRETT. When Congress returned for the short session the President of the United States again came before the House and renewed the recommendations as to the other matters of legislation which had not been contained in the original Adamson Act.

Mr. BLACK. That is true. I commend the President for it.

Mr. GARRETT. Some four weeks, or three weeks, perhaps, before the adjournment of that short session of Congress the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce reported at least a part of that legislation into the House.

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT. The only method by which it could then be brought up—and, of course, practically we know it was then too late to have it pass the Senate—was by a special rule. I can bear personal testimony to the fact that the gentlemen who represented themselves to be representatives of the brotherhoods called at my office, as a member of the Committee on Rules—whether they ever appeared publicly before the Committee on Rules I can not say, because I do not now remember—and they protested against the reporting out of any rule for the consideration of that legislation. I told them that they had come to the wrong office. I was of the opinion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] on that legislation. I was assured by those gentlemen—and by what authority they spoke I can not say—that they were satisfied there would be no further trouble with labor. That did not appeal to me. I still stood for the rule, but the rule was not forthcoming. The legislation did not pass and the Congress was adjourned, and my recollection is that within ten days after that time a strike was threatened while that decision was pending in the Supreme Court of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman is exactly right, and I am now going to read a letter from representatives of the four brotherhoods which, as soon as the legislation the gentleman from Tennessee mentioned was brought up, was written to Members of Congress demanding that they defeat every other feature of the legislation, which had been proposed by the President and which had been embodied in Mr. Adamson's second bill, H. R. 19730. I am going to read you this letter in a moment, but before I do that I will say this: My distinguished friend, and he is a great advocate, Judge HARDY, has deceived himself into believing that this was a real eight-hour-a-day measure, and I am going to prove to the gentleman by the letters of the brotherhoods that it was not an eight-hour measure; that they were emphatically opposed to an eight-hour law, such as is commonly understood when we speak of an eight-hour day. Here is the letter. It speaks for itself. Remember, this letter is dated five months after the enactment of the Adamson law, when they said, "If you give this to us, we are willing to forego other demands and approach the whole problem from an impartial and get-together spirit," and when at the reconvening of Congress the distinguished gentleman from Georgia, Mr. Adamson, chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, introduced a bill that did embody the other features of the President's recommendations, who do we find to be its most vigorous and active opponent? The four railroad brotherhoods of the United States.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman state for the RECORD what those other recommendations were?

Mr. BLACK. I will insert them. I remember one was the compulsory investigation proposal, known as the compulsory conciliation act, during which investigation it would be unlawful to call a strike or for the railroad owners to declare a lockout. I will insert these recommendations of the President with the gentleman's permission. The following are these recommendations:

First. Immediate provision for the enlargement and administrative reorganization of the Interstate Commerce Commission along the lines embodied in the bill recently passed by the House of Representatives and now awaiting action by the Senate, in order that the commission may be enabled to deal with the many great and various duties now devolving upon it with a promptness and thoroughness which are with its present constitution and means of action practically impossible.

Second. The establishment of an eight-hour day as the legal basis alike of work and of wages in the employment of all railway employees who are actually engaged in the work of operating trains in interstate transportation.

Third. The authorization of the appointment by the President of a small body of men to observe the actual results in experience of the adoption of the eight-hour day in railway transportation alike for the men and for the railroads; its effects in the matter of operating costs, in the application of the existing practices and agreements to the new conditions, and in all other practical aspects, with the provision that the investigators shall report their conclusions to the Congress at the earliest possible date, but without recommendation as to legislative action, in order that the public may learn from an unprejudiced source just what actual developments have ensued.

Fourth. Explicit approval by the Congress of the consideration by the Interstate Commerce Commission of an increase of freight rates to meet such additional expenditures by the railroads as may have been rendered necessary by the adoption of the eight-hour day and which have not been offset by administrative readjustments and economies, should the facts disclosed justify the increase.

Fifth. An amendment of the existing Federal statute which provides for the mediation, conciliation, and arbitration of such controversies as the present by adding to it a provision that in case the methods of accommodation now provided for should fail, a full public investigation of the merits of every such dispute shall be instituted and completed before a strike or lockout may lawfully be attempted.

Sixth. The lodgment in the hands of the Executive of the power, in case of military necessity, to take control of such portions and such rolling stock of the railways of the country as may be required for military use and to operate them for military purposes, with authority to draft into the military service of the United States such train crews and administrative officials as the circumstances require for their safe and efficient use.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I have tried to get the gentleman's viewpoint. Is he opposed to an eight-hour day, or was he opposed to the Adamson law because it was not a bona fide eight-hour measure?

Mr. BLACK. If the gentleman will permit me, I will discuss that feature later. I stated on the floor a moment ago why I voted against the Adamson law, when I read my statement, printed September 2, 1916. Was the gentleman in the House at the time?

Mr. WINGO. Certainly. I always listen to the gentleman. The thing I want to get is, is the gentleman opposed to an eight-hour day.

Mr. BLACK. Oh, no; I am not opposed to an eight-hour day, and I have always advocated it whenever it was possible and practicable, but I am going to show to the gentleman from Arkansas that the Adamson law was not an eight-hour day, but was, in fact, a wage-increase bill. If the gentleman has deceived himself into believing that it was a real eight-hour law, then I am surprised.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. BLACK. Not now. I want to read this letter, and then the gentleman can interrogate me all he desires.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WALSH). The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. WINGO. I did not think the gentleman would yield to the question I wanted to propound.

Mr. BLACK. I will yield when I get through with this letter.

Mr. WINGO. Oh, no; the gentleman will not. He is running away from it.

Mr. BLACK. The letter is as follows:

AUSTIN, TEX., January 20, 1917.

HON. EUGENE BLACK, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We are coming to you again asking that you oppose the bill known as H. R. 19730, the Adamson bill—

Remember that is the second Adamson bill, the one that embodied the provisions that were for the benefit of the public.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. MCARTHUR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Texas be extended for ten minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have just come into the Hall, and the gentleman is discussing a law that has been passed for some time——

Mr. BLANTON. While the gentleman has been out of the Hall that matter has been discussed for a considerable time.

Mr. BLACK. I hope the gentleman will not object, as I have not finished reading the letter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, would there be any objection to my having 30 minutes after that?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Fifteen minutes is all that the gentleman requested at first.

Mr. BLACK. I will not object to the gentleman.

Mr. WINGO. Gentlemen who objected to the brotherhoods took the same position the gentleman did then officially, that this was not an eight-hour law, bona fide, with time and a half for overtime, but of course if the House does not care to hear the facts discussed, I shall not press my request.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I want to say this much——

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I hope the gentleman from Arkansas may be allowed 15 minutes.

Mr. BLACK. He will have no objection from me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I just want to say——

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Here is one thing I want to say——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is, Is there objection?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is, Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLACK. Now, here is what the letter goes on and says—or particularly the compulsory arbitration, the absolute eight-hour-day limit to trainmen and enginemen, and the military feature provisions of the bill, and sincerely trust you may fully realize the position of our people in the event these provisions are enacted into law.

Our people desire shorter hours of service in train movement, and the time may come—

I desire the gentleman from Arkansas may give heed to this.

Mr. WINGO. I do not care to listen to the gentleman unless he yields——

Mr. BLACK (continuing reading)— the time may come when an eight-hour-limit day shall be practical, but conditions are such that it could not now be so without an expense that would seem to us not justifiable at this time.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman read the published statement of the brotherhoods made at that time?

Mr. BLACK. I do not have the published statement. The gentleman can read it. I shall be glad to hear him read it.

Mr. WINGO. I can not get time.

Mr. BLACK. Now, speaking of the compulsory arbitration feature.

The compulsory feature would restrict the well-admitted rights of our people to a dangerous degree, especially when conditions would render a decided advantage to the employing class, in that the power of the Government has already been tested as to its ability to curb that class in similar cases in the past few years. Our people possess a great admiration for their Government, as any other class of citizens, against the common enemy, but to further extend military power to the employing class, that would entirely place this department of the Government at the disposal of the protection of property, without a due regard to the protection of human rights, we protest, and respectfully beg of you for that defense of these rights that you have given the people of all classes in your past public service.

This is signed by C. F. Goodridge, Order of Railway Conductors; C. D. Johnson, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers; O. L. Kinsley, Brotherhood of Locomtive Firemen and Enginemen; and Charles Murphy, Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen.

I am not questioning the right of the railroad brotherhoods to oppose the adoption of the second Adamson law or to oppose the adoption of any other law, as for that matter. That is their right; but what I want to emphasize is that having secured their part of the demands in the enactment of the first Adamson law, they set about to actively oppose and did oppose the other recommendations of President Wilson which had been submitted for the protection of the public interest. Their contention which has been made all along in this controversy, to the effect that the owners and managers of the railroads were arbitrary and refused to approach the matter in a spirit of conciliation, I do not believe is sustained by the facts.

The final proposals which were submitted by the managers of the railways in the original controversy were as follows:

(a) The railroads will, effective September 1, 1916, keep the time of all men represented in this movement, upon an eight-hour basis and by separate account, monthly, with each man, maintain a record of the difference between the money actually earned by him on the present basis and the amount that would have been earned upon an eight-hour basis—overtime on each basis to be computed pro rata. The amounts so shown will be subject to the decision of the commission, provided for in paragraph (c) of this memorandum and payable in money, as may be directed by said commission in its findings and decision.

(b) The Interstate Commerce Commission, to supervise the keeping of these accounts and report the increased cost of the eight-hour basis, after such period of actual experience as their judgment approves, or the President may fix, not, however, less than three months.

(c) In view of the far-reaching consequences of the declaration made by the President, accepting the eight-hour day, not only upon the railroads and the classes of labor involved directly in this controversy, but to the public and upon all industry, it seems plain that before the existing conditions are changed the whole subject, in so far as it affects the railroads and their employees, should be investigated and determined by a commission, to be appointed by the President, of such standing as to compel attention and respect to its findings. The judgment of such a commission would be a helpful basis for adjustments with labor and such legislation as intelligent public opinion so informed might demand.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield there, as he has referred——

Mr. BLACK. Just a moment. Now, I have read the letter of the brotherhoods, which opposes each and every feature of the second Adamson bill, which embodied the recommendations of the President, and this letter, in effect, admits that the Adamson law was not an eight-hour bill, and that a real eight-hour law, as we understand it, is impractical in the railway industry. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman permit me just to make this statement?

Mr. BLACK. I will.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I never understood the Adamson law to confine or limit any railroad man to working eight hours, but that eight hours was made the measure of a day's pay under the Adamson law.

Mr. BLACK. What is an eight-hour day?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. An eight-hour day is the work of eight hours per day as a standard day for a standard day's pay.

Now, if by agreement with the railroads they purposed or did make them work more, I do not understand the Adamson bill to prevent that, providing they paid overtime pro rata.

Mr. BLACK. Do not the eight-hour laws we have enacted for the Government of the United States relative to the service of laborers and mechanics employed by the Government prescribe that they shall be eight hours in fact, and that it shall be unlawful for any officer of the Government, unless the President issues an Executive order permitting it, to suspend the operation of such eight-hour law? [Applause.]

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The eight-hour laws we have passed never prescribed that the laborer shall not work more than that, of his own consent, that I have ever seen, and that is all the railroad eight-hour law was. I certainly never misunderstood it. It simply provided that for the purpose of reckoning the compensation for service eight hours should be a day's work for the trainmen.

Mr. BLACK. When the war broke out and it was necessary to operate the Government factories more than eight hours per day, did not the President have to issue an Executive order permitting a longer time than eight hours?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Permitting the employers to put in force a longer time—to require a longer time? Possibly that is true.

Mr. BLACK. Permitting Government officials.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. But the gentleman ought to know there has never been a law put on the statute books that forbids a man from working nine hours under a special contract for the extra hour.

Mr. BLACK. We are not talking about conditions of that kind. We are discussing the meaning of a real eight-hour law.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. One thing further. I want to say this, that so far as the other measures urged by the President were concerned perhaps I agreed with the gentleman when they were before Congress, but I did not let my vote on the Adamson law be governed by what I thought ought to be done in addition. The Adamson law was and is right as an independent matter.

Mr. BLACK. The difference between the gentleman and myself was that I knew as well as I knew anything, or at least I believed as I believe anything, that the time would come when we would face the same situation as we did then. [Applause.] It was not the proper thing to deal with only one feature of it and overlook the other recommendations urged by the President.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Is the gentleman now in favor of an absolute compulsory arbitration?

Mr. BLACK. I will answer that. In reference to interstate carriers I favor the creation of a commission upon which the public, the railroad owners, and the employees will have full and fair representation—and I hope it will be created before this Congress adjourns—that will have the absolute right to adjudicate the differences that arise between the railroad employees and their employers and after having given a careful hearing to both sides and rendering a decision, which I have every confidence to believe will be an impartial one, that that decision shall be binding both upon the carriers and the employees. [Applause.]

I see nothing revolutionary about that. In fact, not to do it will leave the public no protection at all, and I fear that a crisis might arise at some future time which, having no legal instrumentality to deal with it, would precipitate a nation-wide strike, bring widespread disaster and distress to our whole country, and in which catastrophe no one would suffer more than the railroad employees themselves. Legal methods it seems to me are much better methods to settle difficulties of any kind than attempted coercion and force.

I understand very well that the Congress of the United States can not pass any law that will prohibit an individual workman from working whenever he wants to work and quitting whenever he wants to quit, and working for whoever he pleases; nor will Congress attempt to enact any law which will interfere with labor's right to organize and bargain collectively.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. You and I agree on that.

Mr. BLACK. But Congress can and will prevent combinations of both capital and labor from exercising their power in a tyrannical way to the detriment of the peace and welfare of the Nation. [Applause.] That is where I stand on it.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. What remedy would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. BLACK. I have just suggested that I favor a commission with full power to settle the differences which arise between the railroads and their employees. Permit me to say that I have no attack to make upon organized labor as such. Labor unions have been and still are useful to the welfare of labor. I am willing to admit that they have many achievements to their credit which are good, as well as some that are bad. But I realize as a representative of the people that they have demonstrated that some restrictions must be thrown around their use of power. It is bound to come if we are to continue to have a government of law and order. These restrictions and limitations are not only in the interest of society but are absolutely essential to the welfare of labor itself. There is no one but what will concede that combinations of capital have been of vast benefit to the country in the past. They have builded our factories and expanded our commerce. They have belted our Nation with telegraph and telephone lines and have given us the most complete and efficient railway system in the world. And yet, is there a Member on the floor of this House——

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WALSH). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have three minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas have three minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding these great achievements of capital, will any Member on the floor of the House say that it is not necessary to throw some restrictions around their use of power? We have recognized that fact prior to the war and as to common carriers had vested in the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to absolutely regulate and fix their rates, from which they had no appeal except to the courts, whenever the rate was confiscatory. At first the railroads bitterly protested against these regulations and the curbing of their use of power. But it was just, it was right, it was in the public interest, and it is now a settled policy of this country, and there is no longer any contest about it.

Now, will any gentleman have the unwisdom to suggest that great combinations of organized labor can go on continuously without any limitations of their use of power?

Gentlemen, the thirst for power is an appetite which grows by what it feeds upon. One of our great statesmen has said: "Power may justly be compared to a great river, which while kept within its due bounds is both beautiful and useful, but when it overflows its banks it is then too impetuous to be stemmed, it tears down all before it and brings destruction and desolation wherever it comes." I have read that Robespierre when a country judge in France was so tender-hearted that he resigned rather than impose the death penalty upon a convicted criminal, and yet, under the intoxication of power he became one of the most detestable tyrants in the history of the world. They tell us in history that when Caligula was clothed with the imperial purple of Rome and ascended the throne, he passed as a mild-mannered young man, and for eight months thereafter, but under the intoxication of power he became the crazed monarch, and his favorite expression was, "I wish the people of Rome had but one neck." Trojan said that absolute power would convert any man into a wild beast. Absolute power, my friends, can only be safely lodged in the body of the people and exercised through their organized Government.

Why, gentlemen, you can not go on without dealing with this serious situation if this country of ours is to remain a republic of the people, for the people, and by the people. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Now, will the gentleman yield.

Mr. BLACK. Let me finish.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I want the gentleman to suggest something constructive.

Mr. BLACK. If the commission which I have suggested is not constructive, I would like to know the reason why? Gentlemen, the strength of America does not lie in its vastness of territory or its greatness of wealth, though we are the richest Nation in the world.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLACK. The strength of America does not lie in its Navy, although we have one of the best that ever sailed the seven seas.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. The request of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN] was that the gentleman from Texas should have 10 minutes. The Chair must have misunderstood, for the gentleman from Texas has consumed only about three or four minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understood the gentleman from Mississippi to say three minutes. It was so stated by the Chair, and there was no objection. Of course, the Chair may have misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask that my colleague have five minutes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I have no objection to that, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that his colleague have five additional minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I ask permission to have five minutes at the end of the gentleman's time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I am reserving the right to object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is, Is there objection?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. All right. I will not object.

Mr. BLACK. The strength of America does not lie in its Army, though we have one which has been as brave as the invincible Macedonian Phalanx that followed the invincible Alexander the Great through the burning sands of Persia; as brave as were the Roman legions that followed Caesar through the swamps and morasses of Gaul; as brave as was Napoleon's old guard, who knew how to die, but not how to surrender, and who left their hitherto invincible squares on the field of Waterloo. The strength of America does not lie in its great organizations of capital or its great organizations of labor. The strength of America lies in the sacredness of its family altars erected to the glory of God and the hope of the world by the sons of freedom—North, East, South, and West—one God, one flag, one country, "one and inseparable now and forever."

These can only be preserved and handed down to our posterity by preserving the authority of law and the energy of Government. [Applause.]

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I think that after all this talk somebody on the other side ought to be given five minutes to reply to the gentleman from Texas.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not been here in the last few minutes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I think he had about 35 minutes. I talked about 15 or 20 minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. I think the gentleman from Texas used about two-thirds of his time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it but fair that a gentleman on the other side should be recognized.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I want to take a few minutes to call attention to a section of the food-control act which, it seems to me, is crucial to the cost-of-living situation and ought to be enforced. If there has ever been any prosecution under it, I have never heard of it. Section 4 provides—

> That it is hereby made unlawful for any person willfully to destroy any necessaries for the purpose of enhancing the price or restricting the supply thereof; knowingly to commit waste or willfully to permit preventable deterioration of any necessaries in or in connection with their production, manufacture, or distribution.

And section 8 provides—

> That any person who willfully destroys any necessaries for the purpose of enhancing the price or restricting the supply thereof shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not exceeding $5,000 or imprisoned for not more than two years, or both.

Now, it seems to me that is the crucial part of the food-control act. You can allow produce, eggs, meat, fruits, and so forth, put in storage—cold storage where necessary—to be held for almost any length of time, provided no part of the foods stored is allowed to be destroyed or go to waste. They ought all to be sold for consumption, and if all sold they would be sold nearly always at prices that would be pretty nearly right under the law of supply and demand. But if the holders of those foods or necessaries are going to be allowed to permit a part to spoil, or to destroy a part of it rather than put the price down where all of it will sell, then you have left a weapon in the hands of the cold-storage men which is a profiteering weapon that helps to keep up high prices.

I know these sections of the food-control act have been violated. I think the newspapers have given instances of violations of these sections, but I do not believe there has been a prosecution made under either of them, or an attempt to prosecute anybody for willful waste or for destroying necessaries. The language of section 4 ought to be strengthened. It is a little bit difficult to prove willfulness, possibly, in some cases, but there have been cases where willfulness could have been proved. I believe there are lots of cases where both wholesalers and retailers, having a supply of a certain product, a vegetable product or a perishable product on hand, will take the risk of having part of it spoil or destroying part of it in the hope of making a larger profit on what remains. If there are a large number of such violations of the food control act, even though the waste in each case were comparatively small, the aggregate result would be higher prices than ought to prevail. I think any man who will make an investigation in his own neighborhood will find that those things are taking place. They ought to be stopped.

That is about the only effective thing that can be done in the line of prosecution in my opinion, but it is not spectacular, like the prosecution of the beef packers, who are perhaps the most efficient of public servants in the country in a private capacity. They may have violated some part of our antiquated antitrust laws, but their prosecution won't cheapen the cost of anything we buy one cent.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. I have a point which I wish to submit to the gentleman which is somewhat foreign to the subject he is discussing. The gentleman is chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, I believe, is he not?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Is there a bill pending before the gentleman's committee with reference to the Capital Issues Committee, to which the President referred yesterday?

Mr. PLATT. I think that is pending before the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. GARNER. I believe the original law came from the Committee on Ways and Means, but I believe the bill that proposes to extend that law is now before the Committee on Banking and Currency. It is not a revenue measure in any sense of the word. I was just wondering whether the gentleman's committee had given it any consideration, or whether any hearings had been had on it, or what the condition was.

Mr. PLATT. Without committing myself, and without having recently examined the bill, I am inclined to favor it, but have not seen it among the bills referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. ROSE. I am very much impressed with what the gentleman has said about those sections of the law to which he refers. I believe myself that is the gist of the situation. Does the gentleman know of any condition of that kind existing that has been brought to the attention of the authorities for investigation?

Mr. PLATT. Well, taking an instance that everybody knows about, I may mention the fact that the War Department held the biggest supply of foods in the country until it began to deteriorate. I do not think any one will deny that. That was not willfully done, to be sure, to enhance their price, but nevertheless it was done. There are other cases that could be mentioned.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a suggestion there?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The Chief of the General Staff has admitted a great loss by reason of the deterioration.

Mr. PLATT. Yes; I believe that is correct.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. FESS. It has been currently stated in the press that it is the practice of certain commission merchants to buy the whole crop of a certain farmer and then only take such portions of it as they want to use or want to put on the market. Those statements are in the press. Has the gentleman any facts about whether they are true or not?

Mr. PLATT. I have no personal knowledge of the truth of these statements, but have often heard them, and have heard of specific instances which I believe to be true. I think such a practice could be stopped under the sections to which I have called attention.

It seems to me far more important that these sections should be enforced than that there should be any limit placed upon the length of time foodstuffs may be kept in storage. Several States have tried limiting the duration of storage, without the slightest beneficial results to consumers.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. OVERSTREET rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Georgia rise?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I put the House on notice a few minutes ago that I was willing to stay here and transact the legitimate business of the House, but I was not willing to stay here and hear political bunk. I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia makes the point of no quorum.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold that until I can ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks?

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman withhold that?

Mr. OVERSTREET. For a moment.

Mr. MONDELL. There is another gentleman on this side who desires to talk five minutes, and I am sure the gentlemen of the House will be entertained with what he says.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I want to ask leave to revise and extend my remarks.

Mr. OVERSTREET. All right. I will yield to the gentleman five minutes. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may address the House for 10 minutes, if possible.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield a moment to allow me to make a request?

Mr. CROWTHER. I yield to the gentleman for a moment.

Mr. FESS. I ask unanimous consent that I may address the House for 20 minutes when we meet again, on Monday or Tuesday, on the high cost of living.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that when the House next meets, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table, he may address the House on the high cost of living. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], the leader of the majority, gave notice here once that he was not going to permit that to be done, when gentlemen on this side of the House made requests for time. I call the gentleman's attention to that.

Mr. MONDELL. At that time I said I did not think it wise to grant any such request, because there was business before the House, some of it unfinished. I think generally it is somewhat questionable, but I think the situation is somewhat different now, and I should not be inclined to object in this particular case.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, when I hear a Democrat raving and ranting about special interests being identified with the Republican Party, I am reminded that at no period in the history of the Nation have said special interests been coddled and bowed down to as they have been during the past six years of Democratic rule.

You declared yourselves, in 1911, as "Jack the giant killer" in regard to trust busting. But in the performance you have shrunk to a "hop o' my thumb."

The old high cost of living was also to have its fangs removed, but under six years of your economic policy his sting is as virulent as ever. Read your campaign literature on this subject of 1911 and 1912, and if you have not entirely lost your sense of humor you will laugh yourselves to death. [Laughter.]

I desire at this time to refer to the aspersions cast upon this Republican majority by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] as to their sole accomplishment having been the appointment of several "smelling committees" and growling at the President. Well, on the Democratic side of the House there is a long record of failure of accomplishment that even the excuse of the war, which you used continually to hide behind, can not erase. You felt secure in the fact that criticism of your dilatory tactics might be turned to your own benefit by charging with disloyalty everybody on this side of the House who dared to suggest that the Democratic Congress was not the absolute savior of the Nation.

The Democratic Party was returned to power on the plea that your candidate for President would keep us out of war, a war into which we were finally driven by a vision of what might be the horrible fate of our mothers and sisters and daughters and wives at the hands of the brutal Hun. The motive now ascribed for our entry into the war is one highly altruistic, but I ask you how many sons of the United States had laid down their lives without ever having heard of, much less considered, the 14 points.

I have traveled on trains with returning soldiers, I have visited at the training camps, I have fraternized with them at the hospitals, and I have found from their conversation that they had gone forward to demonstrate to the world that the idea that had evidently seeped into the minds of the European nations that "we were too proud to fight" was, in their estimation, a stain on the valor and integrity of the people of the United States that these boys desired to wipe out forever. And as making good is a characteristic of young America, they waded in and cleaned up. [Applause.] I do not desire at this time to speak at length of our soldiers' accomplishments; very many wonderful speeches have been made on the subject by Members on both sides of the House, but I yield to no one in my admiration and appreciation of what they accomplished, these magnificent soldiers, sailors, and marines, for the preservation of liberty and the sanctity of the American home.

Too many times on the Democratic side of the House have patriotic speeches been made with an eye single to covering up the failures as a result of inefficiency in the various departments. Everything from the price of cotton to the failure of the aeroplane production has had its nakedness covered by Democratic orators wrapping it in the Stars and Stripes. I do not need to remind you of the oratorical flights of the distinguished gentleman from Alabama, whose personal pulchritude causes a flutter in every feminine heart whenever he rises to address the House. [Laughter and applause.] But you can only fool a part of the people all of the time, and the soldier boys of the good old U. S. A. know that they helped to win the war, not because of the efficiency of the Democratic administration but that they were successful in spite of the fact that they were seriously handicapped in many branches of the service by your failures. [Applause.] The failures were indirectly the result of watchful waiting, and if the spirit of hide-bound partisanship had been banished from the Democratic administration just long enough to benefit by the prophetic vision and practical advice of the late Theodore Roosevelt and Maj. Gen. Leonard Wood thousands of lives might have been saved and many a mother spared her anguish and sorrow. [Applause.]

You charge the Republican majority with having made no advance in reconstructive legislation after but 10 weeks or less of this special session. Most of that time has been employed in cleaning up the mass of legislation strangled in the closing days of the Sixty-fifth Congress, not as has been so frequently charged on that side of the House by Republican filibustering, but by Democratic procrastination. [Applause.] Also, a desire on your part that if a Republican majority was returned that you might have in special session some legislation of your own construction to play politics with. That you anticipated this condition was clearly exemplified by the letter from the President asking the people for a Democratic Congress as an evidence of confidence in the administration.

Well, the people of the country answered that letter in no uncertain terms, even though their minds were occupied with the Great War, and now that they have opportunity to calmly and carefully consider the facts they will in 1920 serve notice upon the Democratic Party that their services are no longer required. [Applause.]

The gentlemen of the minority seem unduly alarmed that we Republicans are losing our prestige with the people of the country, but in your hearts you know that whenever the country has been under Republican rule a spirit of confidence pervades every individual and all industrial enterprises.

The country, sickened to death with Democratic anemia developed as a result of your "thin-gruel" policy of economics, is now to be refreshed and regenerated by the transfusion of the red blood of Republican accomplishment. [Applause.]

The ending of the war leaves the Republican Congress heir to many serious problems, but past performances give assurance that they will be handled with a maximum of capability, and I trust that there may come from your side of the House that full measure of support for Republican legislation in this coming period of reconstruction that was accorded you by the Republican minority when some of your own Members were weak in the knees on war legislation.

You chide us for having no program for the railroad problem that your administration helped to make a more serious matter than it would normally have been. It is perhaps the greatest problem we have to deal with and affects every citizen of the Nation. Labor and capital must be reconciled, and a fair and square agreement entered into that shall be to the lasting benefit of both. Such legislation can not be enacted as an overnight proposition; it will necessitate the careful consideration of the best minds in this body and knowledge gleaned from extended hearings, at which both labor and capital should be represented. [Applause.]

The placing of the Stars and Stripes on the ocean highways is also a tremendous problem; that an American merchant marine shall ply the waters of the world must no longer be a dream, but a substantial fact. I believe that what has been accomplished in this direction by the present Shipping Board is marvelous, considering the many handicaps they have had to overcome.

In these and many other national problems we desire your assistance rather than carping criticism. On your side of the House are many master minds, and if there could but be devised some method of segregating your copper-headed Democratic partisanship, so that our committees might have the benefit of your colossal intellect, then, with what we in our pigmy minds might devise, we should be able to present some legislation worthy of your consideration. [Laughter.]

And, in passing, do not forget that to our lasting disgrace, through the dilatory tactics of this administration over a period of some years, the most unsafe place for an American citizen to declare himself as such is across the border line in Mexico.

Of course, it is within your province and privilege to proclaim the prestige of your leader, the honored President of the United States. He is the great light around which all you moths have fluttered and have been occasionally singed. Even the distinguished leader of the minority, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], has on several occasions, with all the dignity and courtliness of a Chesterfield and with the chivalrous courtesy of a Raleigh, prostrated himself into the Democratic puddle of inefficiency that the President might have safe passage to his homeland of self-sufficiency. [Laughter.]

Next year on the rostrum you will hold forth and try once more to fool the people, but as you stand before the multitudes you will be surrounded by four pillars, which all your hearers shall observe, and on them shall be graved four slogans: "Watchful waiting," "Peace without victory," "Too proud to fight," and "Politics is adjourned," each of which phrases were coined for use at a particular period. [Applause.]

Oh, how the American people wish that they might be obliterated from their memory. Thank God, the first three were eliminated forever by the traditional loyalty and bravery of American soldiers, sailors, and marines [applause], and the fourth was sufficiently passed upon by the fathers and mothers of this country, who determined by their votes the Republican majority in this House, and in their judgment and stability and ideals of real Americanism I have an abiding faith. [Applause.]

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands be discharged from the further consideration of H. R. 6425, to authorize advances to the reclamation fund and for the issue and disposal of certificates of indebtedness in reimbursement therefor, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the reference of H. R. 6425 be changed from the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands to the Committee on Ways and Means. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What is the bill about?

Mr. KINKAID. It is a bill to provide for raising revenue, which places it in the jurisdiction of the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the change of reference?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL TUESDAY.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I have a privileged resolution which I desire to call up.

Mr. MONDELL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. KITCHIN. Why not adjourn over until Tuesday?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from North Carolina asks why not adjourn over until Tuesday. So far as I am concerned, I have no objection, if that is the will of the House.

Mr. KITCHIN. We know what will be in order on Monday, and the House is not prepared for that work.

The SPEAKER. It requires unanimous consent.

Mr. MONDELL. At the suggestion of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] I will submit the request. I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Tuesday, August 12, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of Commerce, transmitting a serious condition that exists in the variation and methods of paying the draftsmen in the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey to those paid draftsmen in other Government bureaus (H. Doc. No. 178); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of State submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required for the purchase and repair of the premises now occupied by the American embassy, Santiago, Chile (H. Doc. No. 179); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of Commerce submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for improvement of the water supply at Wytheville, Va., fish hatchery (H. Doc. No. 180); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the chairman of the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia, transmitting list of reports from the various public utilities of the District of Columbia (H. Doc. No. 1771, pt. 2, 65th Cong., 3d sess.); to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

Also, petition of physicians, lately medical officers of the United States Army, of Chicago, Ill., indorsing House bill 2492, for conferring of rank on the Army Nurse Corps; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, petition of Pacific Rice Growers' Association, Sacramento, Calif., protesting against House bill 8115; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SMITH of Michigan: Petition of Illinois Association of Postmasters for increased pay; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

SENATE.

MONDAY, August 11, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we come to Thee to worship and lift up our hearts in grateful acknowledgment to Thee for Thy boundless goodness to us. We would not be less grateful because Thy bounties are ministered to us through a thousand avenues of nature. We would not forget the provision Thou hast made for us on the earth, the sea, the sky, because these come to us mediated by the hand of nature. We remember the heart that is back of all, the heart of God, the heart of love. We praise Thee for Thy goodness to us. We pray Thee to accept our expressions of gratitude. In Jesus' Name. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Friday last, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

GOVERNMENT DORMITORIES.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the United States Housing Corporation, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 2d instant, certain information relative to the project known as the Government Hotels, which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

MR. CURTIS presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Newton, Kans., remonstrating against universal military training, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Dewey Lodge, No. 199, Brotherhood of Boilermakers and Iron Shipbuilders of America, of Horton, Kans., favoring the adoption of the so-called Plumb plan for the operation of railroads, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Oswego, Kans., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of the State of Kansas, praying for the establishment of a Department of Education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Winfield, Kans., praying for the repeal of the so-called daylight-saving law, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CURTIS (for Mr. KEYES) presented a petition of sundry citizens of Somersworth, N. H., praying for the repeal of the tax on ice cream, soda, and soft drinks, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GRONNA. I present a memorial from the Jamestown (N. Dak.) Commercial Club with reference to the zone system of rates of postage. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JAMESTOWN COMMERCIAL CLUB,
Jamestown, N. Dak., July 29, 1919.

Whereas the executive committee of the Jamestown Commerical Club after considerable investigation, discussion, and consideration, are of the unanimous opinion that any change in present postal laws that makes a flat rate for transportation of periodicals to all points in the United States should be opposed; and

Whereas we believe that the law, practically universal, that pay for service rendered should be in proportion to the cost of such service is entirely appropriate in this case, and that this principle is now being recognized by the Government in charging periodical transportation by weight and distance and is one of the principal factors in rate making by rate-making commissions: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we sincerely hope you will use your best efforts in Congress to defeat any efforts of publishers to repeal the zone system and revert to the old flat rate of postage on the advertising pages of their periodicals.

JAMESTOWN COMMERCIAL CLUB.
L. B. NIEMEYER, President.
ANDREW HAAS, Secretary.

Mr. FLETCHER presented a resolution adopted by the Central Trades and Labor Council, of Jacksonville, Fla., favoring the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Key West, Fla., praying for the repeal of the tax on ice cream, soda, and soft drinks, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CAPPER presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Barton County, Kans., remonstrating against Federal control of the meat-packing industry, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of the State of Kansas praying for the repeal of the tax on medicines, toilet preparations, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HALE presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Auburn, Me., remonstrating against Federal control of the meat-packing industry, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. PAGE presented a petition of the congregation of the Second Congregational Church of Bennington, Vt., praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a memorial of the Michigan Hardwood Manufacturers' Association remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Federation of Labor of Flint, Mich., praying for the adoption of the so-called Plumb plan for the operation of railroads, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Michigan State Manufacturers' Association favoring the return to private ownership of the railroads of the country, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Social Science Class of the South Baptist Church of Lansing, Mich., praying for the enactment of legislation to reduce the high cost of living, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Muskegon, Mich., praying for the repeal of the tax on ice cream, soda, soft drinks, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COLT presented a resolution adopted by the Equal Suffrage League of Barrington, R. I., favoring the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce, of Providence, R. I., praying for the return to private owners of the railroads of the country, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Americanization Committee of the City of Providence, R. I., favoring the enactment of legislation providing for the training of alien women in citizenship, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LODGE. I ask to have printed in the RECORD, without reading, a telegram from constituents of mine in Massachusetts.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BOSTON, MASS., August 6.

Senator LODGE,
Washington, D. C.:

By unanimous vote citizens of Massachusetts who are delegates representing every one of Ireland's 32 counties, with 20,000 members in Greater Boston, of whom more than 1,500 fought for America, protest ratification of the league of nations in its present form as utterly inconsistent with the ideals of liberty and independence upon which this Government is founded. We are united in believing that our sovereign rights are jeopardized; that articles in the league of nations commit this country to actions which would uphold autocracy and turn a deaf ear to all peoples struggling for liberty; that the ideals for which we entered the war have been swept aside through secret diplomacy, which has evolved this document. We urge you as Representative of Massachusetts to use your influence to prevent its ratification.

JOHN FOLEY, President.
FRANK M. TIERNAN,
WILLIAM H. COLLINS,
WILLIAM OSBORNE,
Vice Presidents.
WILLIAM H. GORMLEY,
JOHN MONAHAN,
Secretaries.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I present a joint memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, relative to certain legislation pending before the Senate. I ask that it be read, and I call the especial attention of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] to the memorial.

The resolution was read and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, as follows:

House joint memorial No. 1.

(Introduced by McQuarrie.)

A memorial to Congress relating to the production, sale, and distribution of live stock and live-stock products, dairy products, poultry and poultry products in commerce.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

We, your memorialists, the Sixteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, in extraordinary session convened, respectfully represent and petition that—

Whereas there is now pending before the Congress of the United States a bill known as S. 2202, introduced by the Hon. W. S. KENYON, Senator from Iowa, providing for the licensing by the Federal Government of all persons engaged in the business of slaughtering live stock, preparing live-stock products for sale, engaged in the business in commerce of buying, selling, or shipping live stock for slaughter and live-stock products, conducting or operating stockyards in which live stock is handled in commerce, performing services in commerce with respect to live stock handled on a commission basis or in connection with stockyards, collecting in connection with stockyards and distributing in commerce live-stock market quotations or live-stock market news, buying, selling, and shipping dairy products, poultry and poultry products in commerce, and providing for the regulation and control thereof by the Federal Government; and

Whereas the legislative assembly is of the belief that all such industries and businesses should be subjected to Federal control and regulation; and

Whereas the legislative assembly is of the belief that the said S. 2202 presents legislation effecting that object: Be it therefore

Resolved by the Sixteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, the House and Senate concurring, That we do respectfully petition and earnestly pray the honorable Congress of the United States for the passage of S. 2202; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be forwarded by the secretary of state of the State of Montana to the Senate of the United States, that a copy of this memorial be forwarded by the secretary of state of the State of Montana to the House of Representatives of the United States, and that copies of this memorial be transmitted by the secretary of state of the State of Montana to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Montana with a request that they use every effort to bring about an accomplishment of the ends and purposes herein set forth.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to read a telegram from Nashville, Tenn., which is as follows:

NASHVILLE, TENN., August 8, 1919.

Hon. KENNETH D. MCKELLAR,
Washington, D. C.:

Tennessee Post No. 6, of the American Legion, composed of 300 discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines of Davidson County, Tenn., at its regular meeting held last night passed, by unanimous vote, a resolution declaring this organization to be opposed to all attempts which are now being made, or may hereafter be made, to coerce the President or the Congress of the United States or to seek by undue influence to control or direct governmental action. I am instructed by this resolution to wire you that this post indorses your efforts to settle and adjust the railroad question and reduce the cost of living through regular governmental agencies and processes, and that to this end we pledge you our unswerving and loyal support and cooperation to the limit.

POST NO. 6, AMERICAN LEGION, DAVIDSON COUNTY, TENN.
By W. P. COOPER, Post Commander.

Mr. President, I wish to say that I think that shows a splendid American spirit. I am delighted to know that the soldiers, sailors, and marines takes such a view. I think it is a healthful sign when, of their own accord, they protest against any attempted coercion or direction of governmental action by any particular class of our people. It is a very strong protest, it seems to me, against any form of Bolshevism in this country, and as such it ought to be commended, and I desire to commend it.

Another hopeful sign in this telegram is their position that whatever reforms or remedies are necessary they should be brought about through regular governmental agencies and processes. That sentiment, also expressed in this telegram, I desire to commend.

LOSSES OF PUBLIC BUILDING CONTRACTORS.

Mr. FERNALD. I report back favorably from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds without amendment the bill (H. R. 6323) for the relief of contractors and subcontractors for the post offices and other buildings and work under the supervision of the Treasury Department, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 146) thereon.

Mr. President, this is a matter of very great importance to the business men of this country who entered into contracts with the Government under the Treasury Department to construct public buildings all over the United States.

The bill has the approval of the ex-Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McAdoo, and the present Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Glass. On account of the high prices of all materials, which immediately became effective after we entered the war, it was necessary for these contractors to pay two and sometimes three and four times as much for their materials as they expected to pay when the contracts were taken previous to the war. The activities of the War and Navy Departments in taking men from them left them without men, and to those they did have they were obliged to pay much higher wages. Sometimes their organizations were entirely broken up. The contractors would have one or two hundred men on a job to-day and would be entirely out of men to-morrow. The Priority Board inspected their changes and they were unable to get material. Some of it expected promptly was delayed for many months.

These contractors to-day are on the verge of bankruptcy. This bill gives them relief, inasmuch as they are ready to take up the matter with the Treasury Department and show their claims. In no case are they to have any profit, but simply to base their settlement upon the loss which was sustained by the activities of the military department.

Mr. SPENCER. The bill has passed the House.

Mr. FERNALD. It passed the House by a very large majority. It was unanimously reported by the Public Buildings and Grounds Committee of the House and also by the Senate Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. It seems necessary that these contractors should have speedy relief, and I ask that the bill may be considered at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. Let it be read first.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed, under such regulations as he may prescribe, to receive fully itemized and verified claims and reimburse contractors and their subcontractors, including material men, for the construction, improvement, special repair, equipment, or furnishing of post offices and other buildings or work under the supervision of the Treasury Department (as well as the United States courthouse in the District of Columbia and the approaches and retaining wall to the Lincoln Memorial in the District of Columbia) whose contracts were awarded or whose bids as thereafter accepted were mailed or delivered to the proper governmental authority prior to the entrance of the United States into the war with Germany, to wit, April 6, 1917, and whose contracts have been or will be completed after said date, for loss due directly to increased costs thereafter arising, due either, first, to increased cost of labor or materials, or, second, to delay on account of the action of the United States Priority Board or other governmental activities, or, third, to commandeering by the United States Government of plants or materials shown to the Secretary of the Treasury to have been sustained by them in the fulfillment of such contracts by reason of war conditions alone: Provided, That any subcontractor may submit his claim through the contractor or to the Secretary of the Treasury. And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to submit from time to time estimates for appropriations to carry out the provisions of this act: Provided further, That no claims for such reimbursement shall be paid unless filed with the Treasury Department within three months after the passage of this act: And provided further, That in no case shall the contractor or subcontractor be reimbursed to an extent greater than is sufficient to cover his actual increased cost in fulfilling his contract or subcontract, exclusive of any and all profits to such contractor or subcontractor; nor shall such reimbursement include any advances or payments made by the sureties of such contractor or subcontractor in executing the work, but the surety on any contract coming within the provisions of this act who, as surety, has completed, or may complete, the work of any defaulting contractor on any such contract, or who has furnished financial assistance to a failing contractor on any such contract whereby such contractor has been enabled to complete such contract, may file claim, within the period hereinbefore fixed, and be reimbursed in the manner hereinbefore provided for the increased cost due to the causes hereinbefore specified of the labor and material supplied in so completing any such contract, or for the increased cost of the labor and material paid for from funds so furnished by such surety: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall report to Congress at the beginning of each session thereof the amount of each expenditure and the facts on which the same is based.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Maine, the chairman of the committee, who has asked for the present consideration of the bill, whether the committee secured any definite information as to the number of claims that would be made under it and any approximation of the total amount involved?

Mr. FERNALD. Yes; we had a hearing last Friday. Many of the contractors appeared.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will state that I am reserving the right to object to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. FERNALD. The Secretary of the Treasury wrote a letter which is attached to the bill. There are about 80 projects involved, and the estimated expense is about $2,132,000—that is the estimate made by the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Glass. These men appeared before the committee last Friday, and it was certainly a pathetic story which they told. Almost every one of them is on the verge of bankruptcy, caused entirely by no fault of their own. As all will remember, the public-building contractors were allowed to work their men only 8 hours, while those engaged in war activities worked their men 10 and 11 and sometimes 12 hours, and at pay and a half; and the wages of common laborers has advanced from $2 to $4 and $5 a day. The War and Navy Departments were both bidding against each other for men, taking them from these organizations, and they were left high and dry to finish their work.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Suppose these contracts had been made by private corporations, would the contractors have had any valid claim against those corporations in such cases?

Mr. FERNALD. If the trouble had been caused by the private citizens or the corporations, I think they would.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I doubt very much whether there is any parallel for reimbursing contractors for losses occurring in this way. I realize that there probably were some losses.

Mr. FERNALD. Some of the contractors appearing before the committee last Friday said that they were reimbursed on private contracts where they were constructing buildings for private individuals.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Has the committee presented a written report?

Mr. FERNALD. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the report contain a list of the projects?

Mr. FERNALD. I think the House committee report does contain such a list. That report is with the bill at the Secretary's desk.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am inclined to think that it is rather a dangerous precedent to establish, if the Government is going to begin reimbursing individuals for war losses.

Mr. FERNALD. It simply gives these men the privilege of taking their cases before the Secretary of the Treasury. It does not settle the claims at all, but gives them a permit to present their claims before the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not so understand the bill. As I understood it, it not only gives them the right to present their claims but provides that the Secretary of the Treasury may pay whatever is determined to be the actual loss.

Mr. FERNALD. The Secretary of the Treasury is to determine the actual loss.

Mr. KING. If my colleague will allow me, this is the language of the bill:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed, under such regulations as he may prescribe, to receive fully itemized and verified the claims and reimburse contractors and their subcontractors—

And so forth.

Mr. FERNALD. Certainly, after the case is presented to him.

Mr. KING. I think this measure is too dangerous. I shall object to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred, as follows:

By Mr. KELLOGG:

A bill (S. 2755) to provide an honorable discharge from the United States Army (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. DIAL:

A bill (S. 2756) to prescribe the method of capital punishment in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

A bill (S. 2765) granting an increase of pension to William H. Mize (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McKELLAR:

A bill (S. 2766) making appropriation for payment of claims of John Sevier, sr., and John Sevier, jr., in accordance with report and findings of the Court of Claims as reported in House Documents Nos. 1302 and 131 under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883, known as the Bowman Act; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. CALDER:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 85) for a special postage stamp to commemorate the three hundredth anniversary of the landing of the Pilgrims; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

LICENSING OF CORPORATIONS.

Mr. KELLOGG. I desire to introduce a bill to provide for the licensing of corporations engaged in interstate commerce and to prevent monopolies and undue restraint of trade, which I ask to have referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The bill (S. 2754) to provide for licensing corporations engaged in interstate commerce and to prevent monopolies and undue restraint of trade was read twice by its title.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I seek the indulgence of the Senate for about five minutes while I make an explanatory statement respecting the bill I offer, in order that it may appear in the RECORD and be available for consideration by the proper committee.

Some years ago, after the prosecution of the Standard Oil Co. by the Government, I became convinced that other means were necessary to regulate trusts and combinations in restraint of trade.

At that time I prepared a bill embodying some of my views, but nothing was ever done with it. I have since revised it, and I now submit it to the consideration of the Congress as a suggestion.

In view of the present conditions, I think I should wish to make some amendments and changes in it, but these can be considered by the committee.

The bill requires all corporations engaged in interstate commerce and having a capital or assets of $10,000,000 or over to take out a Federal license, and provides that when the license is issued by the Federal Trade Commission, such corporation shall be presumed to be a legal corporation, and shall have the right to engage in interstate and foreign commerce, unless the license is revoked, as provided in the bill.

It further provides for a forfeiture of the license if the corporation shall enter into any contract, combination, or conspiracy in restraint of trade, or shall monopolize commerce or attempt to monopolize it. This would give the commission a supervisory jurisdiction over such corporations, and their license would be subject to forfeiture if they engage in a combination to raise or fix prices, engage in unfair methods of competition for the sake of crushing out their competitors, or any of the other abuses which have been in the past commonly employed to monopolize commerce.

It may be that $10,000,000 is excessive, and that smaller corporations should be covered by the bill. It was my view at the time I prepared this bill that the danger of monopolization of commerce arose with regard to those large corporations having business all over the country capable of exerting their power.

It is my opinion that prosecution under the present antitrust act is not a sufficient remedy. There should be a department of the Government having power of supervision, not necessarily interfering with the business of the country, but possessing the power to investigate, publish the facts, and take immediate action to revoke a license if a corporation abuses its power. With this power in the Federal Government, there will be less likelihood of price-fixing agreements. The bill provides, however, if the license is forfeited the corporation may protect its rights in the courts. I would not give to any executive board of the Government the absolute power to bar a corporation from engaging in interstate commerce. On the other hand, under the present law, many corporations do not know whether or not they are lawfully transacting business, or whether they are legally organized.

I do not mean that they do not know when they form an unlawful combination and agree on prices, but as to whether the corporate combination itself is legal or not lawyers disagree and courts disagree.

Lawyers and courts differ on the subject. They should be licensed and know whether their business is lawful. In fact, as this bill provides, they should have the right to apply to the commission and have it determined in advance whether any proposed action is legal.

The bill also regulates the issuance of stock and securities by such corporations and requires all stock hereafter issued to be fully covered either in property or money.

It provides that a corporation having more than 50 per cent of the total business of the same character in the United States shall not purchase the property and business of any other corporation engaged in a similar and competitive business, unless the said purchasing corporation shall apply to the commission and receive the approval thereof. The object of this provision is to prevent a large corporation, having more than 50 per cent of the business, from using its power to compel its competitors to sell, and from acquiring a complete monopoly by purchase of competitive concerns.

This does not prevent a corporation having a natural monopoly by patent enjoying all its business nor does it prevent a corporation or individual business from growing. It simply prevents them from acquiring power by combination, as in the past.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. The suggestion which the Senator makes is very interesting. The thought has occurred to me on a number of occasions, and it is reenforced by the attitude of the Senator, that the entire question might be reached by the invocation of the taxing power. Have a graduated tax increasing in its effect so that the larger the corporation and the larger the returns of the corporation, the heavier the tax. Then, if you desire, by a graduated tax, to suppress a corporation that grows too large, confiscate all of the returns of the corporation above a certain amount, and in that way automatically and without the intervention of licenses and the instrumentalities of the Government and officialdom, any corporation might be crushed and driven out of existence.

Mr. KELLOGG. An objection to such a tax would be that certain classes of business require very great capital and a very large aggregation while other classes of business do not, and it is impossible, I believe, to tell where we should commence to impose the tax. I think it will be found of very great difficulty.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand that the Senator's bill provides for a licensing system, and that some one under the system is to determine when the corporations are legally organized and when they are carrying on legitimate business?

Mr. KELLOGG. Some one is to determine before the corporation is licensed whether it is legally organized. Of course, the party has the right of appeal to the courts if he claims that his corporation is legally organized and the department denies the license. We could not take away that right.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand that the system includes also a supervision of a corporation from time to time under the licensing system as to whether or not it is conducting its business in a legitimate way?

Mr. KELLOGG. It does.

Mr. BORAH. Who is going to determine that?

Mr. KELLOGG. Of course, that is determined under the rules of law. I do not believe that we should give any man the absolute power to determine whether or not a corporation is obeying the law. This bill is intended to create a control similar to that exercised under the Sherman Act or the antitrust act.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. KELLOGG. If the Senator will permit me to conclude my statement first, I shall be glad to answer his question.

It is in the best interest of the country that there should be a free and open field in which to engage in business, and then competitors should not be destroyed through unfair methods of competition or oppression by a corporation having large capital and great power. On the other hand, there may be cases where it is in the interest of the public that such a corporation should purchase its competitors and the corporation should know whether it has such right or not. At present no one can tell, and the right to make such a purchase or consolidation can only be determined at the end of long litigation under the Sherman Act.

I yield now to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. The question I was about to ask the Senator is this: As I understand the object of the Federal trade act, it was to provide machinery something akin to that suggested by the Senator from Minnesota. If the Federal Trade Commission should intelligently exercise the powers that have been committed to it, could it not prevent much of the unfair discrimination, much of the monopoly, which the bill of the Senator is aimed to prevent?

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not think they have the power. They can only prosecute in the courts. After extended litigation or prosecution under the criminal law they may obtain a conviction, but the business of this country can not be regulated by criminal prosecutions. Some power should exist to speedily remedy a price-fixing agreement.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think the Federal Trade Commission has utterly failed to justify its creation?

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not think it has.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat I should like to ask him a question. Under the bill to which he has just called the attention of the Senate, in the event the Federal Trade Commission should find that a given corporation was either violating the law or was within the law, is that finding reviewable by any court?

Mr. KELLOGG. Oh, yes. It would have to provide that, because I do not think we can deny the corporation its day in court. If the licenses are liable to forfeiture very few corporations will enter into any price-fixing agreement, in my opinion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

RETIREMENT OF CIVIL-SERVICE EMPLOYEES.

Mr. KELLOGG submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1699) for the retirement of the employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment and ordered to be printed.

GOVERNMENT IRRIGATION PROJECTS.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the hard conditions prevailing throughout the country by reason of the high cost of living have been aggravated in the State of Montana by reason of the prevalence of the severest drought in the history of our State. I regret to say that recent reports coming to me from the Department of Agriculture indicate that the grain crop generally in our State is a total failure, or practically so. The conditions have induced the governor of our State to call the legislature in extraordinary session for the purpose of considering conditions. I am in receipt of a telegraphic copy of a resolution adopted by the Sixteenth Legislative Assembly of Montana asking for relief from Congress. I ask that it be read from the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

HELENA, MONT., August 9, 1919.

Hon. THOMAS J. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

We, the Sixteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, in extraordinary session assembled, do hereby urgently recommend that you promptly enact legislation appropriating the sum of $50,000,000 for work on Government irrigation projects throughout the West. The long-extended drought prevailing throughout Montana has rendered more storage and use of water for irrigation purposes a problem of grave importance; and as the projects undertaken by the United States Reclamation Service are entirely under Federal control, the individual State is powerless to aid in their completion. The farmers of Montana exerted their utmost efforts and staked their entire resources in response to every call of the United States Government for increased crop production and for the raising of funds for the different purposes required in the prosecution of the World War. And because of the unprecedented drought conditions during the last three seasons and especially the season of 1919, the many farmers of Montana are faced with the disastrous effects of such drought, clearly demonstrating the great need and necessity of said appropriation for the purpose of storing and retaining the vast quantity of flood waters which flow to waste each year, which, if made available, would reclaim a vast acreage of the lands of the State and make them more certain and profitable for the raising of such crops as are necessary for the support of the Nation in time of peace or war. For all of which reasons we urgently recommend the speedy enactment of the proposed legislation as embodying a sound business policy applies to a great national problem.

The secretary of the State of Montana is hereby directed to transmit by wire and in writing copies of this memorial to the President of the Senate, to the Speaker of the House of Representaties, to the Secretary of the Interior, and to the Montana Senators and Representatives in Congress.

C. T. STEWART,
Secretary of State.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, although the resolution does not refer to the fact, the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands of the Senate sometime ago reported to the Senate favorably a bill in accord with the recommendation now made by the Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana. It was reported by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], and I trust it may soon have the consideration of the Senate.

RAILWAY REORGANIZATION.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have a copy of a letter written by the able Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], dealing with the Plumb plan for railway reorganization and cognate legislation. I regard it as such an able exposition of the entire subject that I ask that it be printed in the RECORD. It is very lengthy, or I should like to have it read, but I will not ask to have that done now.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Copy of Senator POMERENE'S letter to men here named in re Plumb plan for railway reorganization: Mr. James G. Harkins, Mr. Frank Spicer, Mr. J. W. McDonald, Mr. H. E. Wright, Mr. G. A. Stephenson, Mr. Patrick J. Gorman, Mr. Fred Martin (secretary), Mr. H. T. Hamilton, committee representing Hocking Valley Federation System No. 51, affiliated with railway employees' department of the American Federation of Labor, Columbus, Ohio.]

Gentlemen, I beg to acknowledge your favor of the 29th ultimo in support of the Plumb plan for railway reorganization, which reads as follows (the italics being my own):

"Perhaps you will be pleased to know of the interest our membership manifests in behalf of the masses of the people.

"Nine or ten weeks ago a committee was appointed, who was assigned to the duty of investigating thoroughly all legislative matters and candidates for political offices, then presenting their findings and recommendations to their constituents for confirmation.

"The first task, however, that was assigned to the committee was the 'Glenn E. Plumb suggested plan for railway reorganization.' Candidly speaking, the committee labored faithfully and constantly for eight weeks, studying and counseling with lawyers and professors, with a view of ascertaining different interpretations from those who were in a sense disinterested directly in the railway problem, and in order that the so-called selfish interests would be destroyed and be in an able position to intelligently present their findings and recommendations to the rank and file for approval.

"On the 23d day of July the committee concluded their task in connection with the 'suggested Plumb plan.' On the following Monday the recommendations thereto were presented to a called meeting of representatives and delegates, who unanimously adopted the committee's report and 'Mr. Plumb's suggested plan' in its entirety, even though the plan was not thought to be perfect, but far superior to private operation and the operation in effect at the present time, and, in fact, the only ultimate solution of the 'railroad problem' that has as yet been presented to your honorable body.

"Therefore we take this opportunity of ascertaining your theory of the railroad plan herein referred to and trust you will be candid enough to please inform us as to whether you are for it or against it."

My answer will be as frank and as direct as your letter. I think it will be conducive to a better understanding if we shall forget for the time being that you are railway men and I am a United States Senator, and in a matter of such grave importance let us counsel together as American citizens, always remembering that laws should be enacted because they are right or defeated because they are wrong, and not because they will make or lose votes for the legislator.

With this thought in mind, let me ask you:

First. In your deliberations whom did you consult who was representative of "the masses of the people" as contradistinguished from those who were personally interested in the plan, and, if you consulted such persons, did "the masses" choose them or did you choose them, and what did they say either for or against it?

Second. I note that you counseled with lawyers and professors.

Who were these lawyers and professors?

What interest did they have in the subject?

In what respect did they represent the masses?

What did they say, either for or against the subject? and

What was their purpose in advising you? Was it with a view of giving you enlightenment, or was it for the purpose of serving some selfish motive of their own with the hope of currying favor with you?

Third. You tell me that you studied this for a matter of 9 or 10 weeks, and on the 23d day of July (Wednesday) you concluded your task, and on the following Monday these recommendations were presented to a called meeting of representatives and delegates, who unanimously adopted the committee's report.

Who were these representatives and delegates who were able at one sitting to understand the Plumb plan and advise as to what should be done in the interest of "the masses of the people"? Were they chosen by "the masses" to represent them?

Fourth. You write me that the Plumb plan is the only "ultimate solution of the 'railroad problem' that has as yet been presented to your honorable body."

Many proposed plans are pending before the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate, and all of them are being carefully studied with a view of the best possible solution of the situation.

Did your committee or "the representatives and delegates who unanimously adopted the Plumb plan in its entirety" examine these plans, or any of them, before passing judgment upon them?

Now, let us go a step further. You and I understand that the transportation system of the country is vitally related to the industrial, the financial, and the social welfare of 110,000,000 people. The railroads of this country, in round numbers, are valued at $20,000,000,000. They are the web and woof of America's industrial, commercial, and social life. Under the Plumb plan it is proposed to take this property by purchase or condemnation from its stockholders, among whom are thousands, not to say millions, of the plain people of the country—old and young, the widows and the orphans—and to pay for them in cash payments or by the issuance to such owners of United States Government bonds. In other words, they shall be paid for by the people's cash or by their obligations. They are then to be managed and operated by the national railway operating corporation for 100 years, which shall have a board of directors to be composed of 15 men, 5 of whom shall be selected by the classified employees of the railways, 5 by their official employees, and 5 to be appointed by the President, not more than 3 of them to belong to one political party.

Suffice it to say that you and I both understand—even if we are not willing to admit it—that the 10 railway directors will have interests which will be at variance with the interests of the traveling and shipping public, who pay the bill; and while the other 5 appointed by the President are said to represent the public, which perhaps embraces about 100,000,000 people—I mean the people other than those who will be directly or indirectly interested either as the classified and official railway employees or their families—they will owe their appointment to a political power and, it is my judgment, may be influenced by the political purposes of the party in control of the Government.

Are you quite sure that when the Plumb plan was devised it was in the interest of "the masses"? If so, how does it happen that the bill is presented by the brotherhoods alone and their associates? Why were not the interests of the general public consulted?

In the history of railroad economics do you know of any country anywhere under which any plan akin to the Plumb plan has been adopted? Are you quite sure that it is fundamentally sound to require the Government of the United States to invest $20,000,000,000—about one-twelfth of the total wealth of the country—in this enterprise and turn it over to the operatives for 100 years?

If the Plumb plan is sound economically and is for the interests of "the masses," why do you not suggest that similar legislation be adopted whereby all public utilities, including water works, electric-light plants, gas and heating plants, be purchased and turned over to their employees and operatives, respectively?

If it is sound and in the interest of the masses, why do you not suggest that all the coal mines, iron and copper mines, be purchased by the Government and turned over to the operatives in the same way?

Why do you not suggest that all the manufacturing and industrial plants of the country be purchased with Government funds or by the issuance of Government bonds and turned over to their operatives in the same way?

Why do you not advise that all the stores be purchased and turned over to their operatives in the same way?

Why do you not recommend that all the banks of the country be acquired by the Government and turned over to their operatives?

Why do you not ask, in the interest of "the masses," that the Government purchase all the farms of the country and turn them over to the employees on the farms?

And, lastly, may I suggest that if one man should happen to own two houses, one of which he rents, why do you not ask that the second house shall be bought by the Government and turned over to the renter?

Where is this going to end?

My friends, permit me to say the Plumb plan has nothing akin to it outside Bolshevik Russia.

It is worse than socialism.

Socialism contemplates the public ownership of property to be controlled and operated by the public for the public. The Plumb plan contemplates the public ownership of the railroads for a class. As already stated, they are to be taken over by purchase or condemnation and paid for with the cash or bonds of the whole people, and then turned over to the national railway operating corporation, whose board of directors shall consist of 15 men, 10 of whom shall be railroad classified and official employees. As neither class of these employees will have any stock, their interests will be one and the same as against the public. In other words, $20,000,000,000 worth of property bought by money belonging to 110,000,000 people is to be turned over to 2,000,000 railroad men, representing, perhaps, including their families, 10,000,000.

Does this seem to be for the benefit of "the masses?"

Mr. Plumb in his testimony before the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce in February assumed that the capital invested amounted to $18,000,000,000 approximately. In his testimony last week before the Interstate Commerce Committee of the House he estimated that all the present owners would get for their property is $13,000,000,000. So, according to his own testimony, Mr. Plumb's plan, if enacted into law, will substantially confiscate $5,000,000,000 worth of property belonging to private owners.

And how is he to pay for this property even at this reduced value?

He tells the public that he will, by his plan, save to the shippers of the country a large expense, in that these bonds can be sold for 4 per cent.

The railroads earned during the three years before Government control 5.24 per cent. He does not say who is to buy this perhaps $18,000,000,000 or $20,000,000,000 worth of bonds. He has not named the purchasers.

May I not remind you that during the last Victory loan, by the best organized, nation-wide campaign conducted by all the patriotic men, women, and children of the country, we sold less than seven billions of bonds at 4¾ per cent. And if, when all the patriotism of the country was back of this campaign, it was so difficult to sell these bonds at par for 4¾ per cent, will Mr. Plumb rise up and tell us where he is going to sell $20,000,000,000 worth of bonds—probably the real value of the roads—at 4 per cent?

Ought you not to tell me how we are going to sell these bonds when you ask me to support this proposed legislation?

Does it not occur to you, when not only the whole Nation but the whole world is disturbed, industrially, economically, and financially, that we had better wait until normal conditions are restored before beginning a scheme so revolutionary as that proposed in the Plumb plan, even if it were sound?

And what would be the result if it fails?

Invoking the principle of brotherhood—a name I love—do you not feel you ought to be consistent, and while asking for this investment of the public funds for your benefit to likewise ask for the benefit of a proportionally equal amount of Government funds for every other business enterprise in the United States, and turn that over to the employees of those several enterprises?

Does not the principle of fraternity suggest this?

And by the time we get through with it there will be $240,000,000,000 of Government bonds issued and on the market.

My friends, this Plumb plan spells ruin for beloved America.

In the past few years a good many people have urged Federal ownership and control of the railroads, the telegraphs, and the telephones. In view of recent experiences most of them who have had no selfish purpose to serve have changed their views. Government control of these utilities has been so complete that it does not differ materially from actual Government ownership, and there is no such radical difference between the present Government control and operation and that provided for in the Plumb plan as to warrant anyone in saying that while the former has been a failure the latter will be a success.

From the standpoint of operation every user of the railroads, telegraphs, and telephones knows that the service has been worse than during the private control, excepting only the condition of the railroads during the last two months of private control, which was due to war conditions.

And let me say a word concerning Government control of railroads from a financial standpoint.

You will remember that the increases in wages during the year 1918 were made retroactive, dating from January 1, 1918.

Freight rates were advanced 25 per cent and passenger rates much more, the increases to take effect as of July 1, 1918. Director General McAdoo, in his testimony before the Committee on Interstate Commerce, said to us that if the increase in rates had been for the entire year there would have been a "substantial surplus for the year of at least $100,000,000 to the Government." And he added, "For the year 1919, with all wage increases granted in 1918 operating for the entire 12 months, and upon the assumption that the traffic for 1919 is substantially the same as in 1918 and that the cost of fuel and supplies remains the same, it is estimated that there should be a surplus to the Government over and above the standard return of approximately $100,000,000."

As I now recall, Director General Hines gave substantially the same assurances early in January of this year.

But what was the result? Senator CUMMINS, chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee, speaking in the Senate on August 5, said, "We lost $240,000,000 last year, and we lost in the first four or five months in this year, 1919, $260,000,000, and we are now losing at the rate of $30,000,000 a month."

Do you really believe that under the Plumb plan you can turn this deficit under Government control either into a surplus for the account of the Government or the public or into better service for the country?

I do not believe it can be done except by one increase after another in transportation rates.

Permit me to make another suggestion: Since Government control was begun the wages to the employees have been increased about $1,000,000,000. The Director General, on July 31, 1919, informed the President that additional increases were demanded which would aggregate, if granted, about $800,000,000 more per year.

I have no knowledge as to whether the conditions are such as to justify this increase or not, and I express no opinion with regard to it. I want the railroad men and all laboring men to be liberally paid, whether under public or private control.

But this is only an incident to the larger question to which I want to call your attention. If the conditions are such that this increase is justified, then I am for it. I await the proof before I shall decide it.

But when your representatives come to Washington and not only ask this increase but demand that the Congress of the United States shall buy these properties at a cost to the Government of $18,000,000,000 or $20,000,000,000 and turn them over to the national railway operating corporation for management and operation I want to say to you as one American to another it is neither fair nor American for them to insinuate revolution, as they have before the Interstate Commerce Committee of the House, unless their demands are granted.

And let me suggest that the people at large have not expressed any desire for this plan, but members of your brotherhoods—I do not mean the chiefs—have been in Washington making their threats as to what would happen unless this legislation is enacted. As one Senator I shall always be open to conviction, but I never yet have yielded to a threat, and I never will.

Of course, I know that you do not approve these methods. Law-abiding citizens, real Americans, never do approve them. It is only men of the Bolshevik type of mind that ever resort to them.

Among the threats that have been made are threats of a nation-wide strike. I do not mean to suggest that the chiefs of the brotherhoods have suggested a nation-wide strike, but some of the members of the brotherhoods have made these threats here in Washington to Senators. I am sure that you do not give any countenance to strikes under present conditions.

I believe in the right of the laboring man to use the instrument of the strike under proper circumstances, but I do not believe the occasion is here or ever has been here or ever will be here which will justify a nation-wide strike, with all the distress it will bring, not only on the public at large but on the strikers and their families.

With a general strike on in this country, tying up all the railroads, the products of the mine and the farm and the factory could not be moved to the centers of population and in one week's time the people of our great cities would be starved, and in winter frozen. The people of these centers of population include the wives, the children, and the babes of railway men as well as others. It is too shocking a situation to even contemplate.

A subcommittee of the Interstate Commerce Committee, of which I am a member, has been engaged for a number of weeks in preparing a bill providing for the reorganization and regulation of the railroads to present to the full committee for its consideration. I hope it will appeal to the sober sense of the public. I can give no assurances as to whether it will be approved or disapproved, but of this I am convinced, that the American public never will approve the Plumb plan or anything akin to it.

The Plumb plan is the most vicious piece of legislation that has been presented to Congress since I have been in the Senate. I would feel that I was contributing to the ruin, not only of the transportation system of the country, but to its financial and industrial breakdown, if I voted for it. It would lead not only to the ruin of the whole people but to every railroad man as well.

Notwithstanding the statement in your letter to the effect that this plan was unanimously adopted at a meeting of the representatives and delegates to whom it was submitted by you, I venture the assertion that when they understand it the vast majority of them will oppose it.

Much has been said by the brotherhood chiefs and their counsel in the last few days here in Washington about the democratization of industry, and the Plumb plan is referred to as the means of democratizing transportation. A careful study of the bill will show that it is not democracy in transportation for which it provides, but autocracy in transportation.

Mr. Plumb the other day referred to the Wall Street control of the railroads. That was true in the past. It is not true now. Wall Street has many vicious things to its credit in years gone by, but the captains of finance have never demanded $20,000,000,000 of the American people's money at one time!

The Plumb plan out-Harrimans Harriman in his palmiest days! The public does not want to be skinned, but if it must be skinned it will make little difference whether it is by Wall Street or by the methods provided for in the proposed Plumb plan.

It was my pleasure in 1916 to support your claims for the Adamson law, because I believed that you were entitled to better working hours and to better compensation, and so long as I am in public life it will be my pleasure to do whatever can be reasonably done to advance the interests of labor, but bear in mind that it is not "every one who cries unto me, 'Lord, Lord,' shall enter the kingdom of heaven," and it is not every man who comes around declaiming in favor of labor who is labor's friend.

I am sure that a sober second thought will persuade you that this bill ought to be defeated.

Sincerely, yours,

ATLEE POMERENE.

PEACE TREATY AND LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask permission of the Senate to have printed in the RECORD a letter from the President of the United States addressed to me as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations in reply to a resolution of that committee, and I ask to have printed with it the resolution requesting the President to send in certain papers. The resolution and the President's letter are self-explanatory. I will not ask to have them read now, but simply printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution and letter of the President were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations respectfully requests the President, if not incompatible with the public interest, to transmit the following to the committee:

"1. All drafts or forms presented to or considered by the peace commissioners relating to a league of nations, and particularly the draft or form prepared or presented by the commissioners of the United States;

"2. All proceedings, arguments, and debates, including the transcript of the stenographic reports of the peace commission relating to or concerning a league of nations, or the league of nations finally adopted; and all data bearing upon or used in connection with the treaty of peace with Germany now pending."

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, 8 August, 1919.

My DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I have at last been able to go personally over the great mass of papers which remained in my hands at the close of my stay in Paris, and am disappointed to find that it is in no respect a complete file, the complete files remaining with the American Commission.

You ask for all drafts or forms presented to or considered by the Peace Commissioners relating to the League of Nations, and particularly the draft or form prepared or presented by the Commissioners of the United States. There are no formal drafts in my possession, except that presented by the American Commissioners, and this I take pleasure in enclosing, along with the formal Report of the Commission on the League of Nations.

You also ask for all proceedings, arguments, and debates, including a transcript of the stenographic reports of the Peace Commission relating to or concerning a League of Nations or the League of Nations finally adopted, and all data bearing upon or used in connection with the Treaty of Peace with Germany now pending. No stenographic reports were taken of the debates on the League of Nations, and such memoranda as were taken it was agreed should be confidential. The reason for regarding as confidential intimate exchanges of opinion with regard to many delicate matters will, of course, occur to you, and I beg to say that I am following the example of the representatives of the other Governments in making this explanation.

The various data bearing upon or used in connection with the Treaty of Peace with Germany are so miscellaneous and enormous in mass that it would be impossible for me to supply them without bringing from Paris the whole file of papers of the Commission itself, and would include many memoranda which, it was agreed on grounds of public policy, it would be unwise to make use of outside the Conference.

Very sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
Chairman Committee on Foreign Affairs,
United States Senate.

Mr. LODGE. We asked for a large number of documents. For reasons which seemed good to the President we received only one, which is a printed draft of the American plan for a covenant, and with it a report of the commission on the league of nations, which contains what is known as the first draft of the league, which, of course, was printed everywhere in this country last March. I ask that those may be printed in the RECORD together and as a document.

Without objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed as a document (S. Doc. No. 70) and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"AMERICAN DRAFT OF COVENANT OF LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

"PREAMBLE.

"In order to secure international peace and security by the acceptance of obligations not to resort to the use of armed force, by the prescription of open, just and honorable relations between nations, by the firm establishment of the understandings of international law as the actual rule of conduct among governments, and by the maintenance of justice and a scrupulous respect for all treaty obligations in the dealings of organized peoples with one another, and in order to promote international cooperation, the Powers signatory to this Covenant adopt this constitution of the League of Nations.

"Article I.

"The action of the Contracting Powers under the terms of the Covenant shall be effected through the instrumentality of a Body of Delegates which shall consist of the diplomatic representatives of the Contracting Powers accredited to X. and the Minister of Foreign Affairs of X. The meetings of the Body of Delegates shall be held at the seat of government of X. and the Minister for Foreign Affairs of X. shall be the presiding officer.

"Whenever the Delegates deem it necessary or advisable, they may meet temporarily at the seat of government of Y. or of Z., in which case the diplomatic representative to X. of the country in which the meeting is held shall be the presiding officer pro tempore.

"It shall be the privilege of any of the Contracting Powers to assist its representative in the Body of Delegates by any method of conference, counsel, or advice that may seem best to it, and also to be represented at any time by a special representative.

"Article II.

"The Body of Delegates shall regulate their own procedure and shall have power to appoint such committees as they may deem necessary to inquire into and report upon any matters that lie within the field of their action.

"It shall be the right of the Body of Delegates, upon the initiative of any member, to discuss, either publicly or privately as it may deem best, any matter lying within the field of action of the League of Nations as defined in this Covenant, or any matter likely to affect the peace of the world; but all actions of the Body of Delegates taken in the exercise of the functions and powers granted to them under this Covenant shall be formulated and agreed upon by an Executive Council, which shall act either by reference or upon its own initiative and which shall consist of the representatives of the Great Powers, together with representatives drawn in annual rotation from two panels, one of which shall be made up of the representatives of the States ranking next after the Great Powers and the others of the representatives of the minor States (a classification which the Body of Delegates shall itself establish and may from time to time alter), such a number being drawn from these panels as will be but one less than the representatives of the Great Powers; and three or more negative votes in the Council shall operate as a veto upon any action or resolution proposed.

"All resolutions passed or actions taken by the Body of Delegates or by the Executive Council, except those adopted in execution of any specific powers herein granted, shall have the effect of recommendations to the several governments of the League.

"The Executive Council shall appoint a permanent Secretariat and staff and may appoint joint committees, chosen from the Body of Delegates or consisting of other specially qualified persons, for the study and systematic consideration of the international questions with which the Council may have to deal, or of questions likely to lead to international complications or disputes. The Executive Council shall also take the necessary steps to establish and maintain proper liaison both with the foreign offices of the Contracting Powers and with any governments or agencies which may be acting as mandataries of the League in any part of the world.

"Article III.

"The Contracting Powers undertake to respect and to protect as against external aggression the political independence and territorial integrity of all States members of the League.

"Article IV.

"The Contracting Powers recognize the principle that the maintenance of peace will require the reduction of national armaments to the lowest point consistent with domestic safety and the enforcement by common action of international obligations; and the Executive Council shall formulate plans for effecting such reduction. It shall also inquire into the feasibility of abolishing compulsory military service and the substitution therefor of forces enrolled upon a voluntary basis and into the military and naval equipment which it is reasonable to maintain.

"The Executive Council shall also determine for the consideration and action of the several governments what military equipment and armament is fair and reasonable in proportion to the scale of forces laid down in the programme of disarmament; and these limits, when adopted, shall not be exceeded without the permission of the Body of Delegates.

"The Contracting Powers further agree that munitions and implements of war shall not be manufactured by private enterprise and that there shall be full and frank publicity as to all national armaments and military or naval programmes.

"Article V.

"The Contracting Powers agree that should disputes or difficulties arise between or among them which cannot be satisfactorily settled or adjusted by the ordinary processes of diplomacy, they will in no case resort to armed force without previously submitting the questions and matters involved either to arbitration or to inquiry by the Executive Council and until there has been an award by the arbitrators or a recommendation by the Executive Council; and that they will not even then resort to armed force as against a member of the League of Nations who complies with the award of the arbitrators or the recommendation of the Executive Council.

"The Contracting Powers agree that whenever any dispute or difficulty shall arise between or among them with regard to any question of the law of nations, with regard to the interpretation of a treaty, as to any fact which would, if established, constitute a breach of international obligation, or as to any alleged damage and the nature and measure of the reparation to be made therefor, if such dispute or difficulty cannot be satisfactorily settled by the ordinary processes of negotiation, to submit the whole subject matter to arbitration and to carry out in full good faith any award or decision that may be rendered.

"In case of arbitration, the matter or matters at issue shall be referred to arbitrators, one of whom shall be selected by each of the parties to the dispute from outside their own nationals, when there are but two such parties, and a third by the two thus selected. When there are more than two parties to the dispute, one arbitrator shall be named by each of the several parties and the arbitrators thus named shall add to their number others of their own choice, the number thus added to be limited to the number which will suffice to give a deciding vote to the arbitrators thus added in case of a division among the arbitrators chosen by the contending parties. In case the arbitrators chosen by the contending parties cannot agree upon an additional arbitrator or arbitrators, the additional arbitrator or arbitrators shall be chosen by the Executive Council.

"On the appeal of a party to the dispute the decision of said arbitrators may be set aside by a vote of three-fourths of the Delegates, in case the decision of the arbitrators was unanimous, or by a vote of two-thirds of the Delegates in case the decision of the arbitrators was not unanimous, but unless thus set aside shall be finally binding and conclusive.

"When any decision of arbitrators shall have been thus set aside, the dispute shall again be submitted to arbitrators chosen as heretofore provided, none of whom shall, however, have previously acted as arbitrators in the dispute in question, and the decision of the arbitrators rendered in this second arbitration shall be finally binding and conclusive without right of appeal.

"If for any reason it should prove impracticable to refer any matter in dispute to arbitration, the parties to the dispute shall apply to the Executive Council to take the matter under consideration for such mediatory action or recommendation as it may deem wise in the circumstances. The Council shall immediately accept the reference and give notice to the parties, and shall make the necessary arrangements for a full hearing, investigation and consideration. The Council shall ascertain and as soon as possible make public all the facts involved in the dispute and shall make such recommendation as it may deem wise and practicable based on the merits of the controversy and calculated to secure a just and lasting settlement. Other members of the League shall place at the disposal of the Executive Council any and all information that may be in their possession which in any way bears upon the facts or merits of the controversy; and the Executive Council shall do everything in its power by way of mediation or conciliation to bring about a peaceful settlement. The recommendation of the Executive Council shall be addressed to the disputants. Should the Executive Council fail to arrive at any conclusion, it shall be the privilege of the members of the Executive Council to publish their several conclusions or recommendations; and such publications shall not be regarded as an unfriendly act by any of the disputants.

"The Executive Council may in any case refer the consideration of a dispute to the Body of Delegates. The consideration of the dispute shall be so referred at the request of either party to the dispute. In any case referred to the Body of Delegates all the provisions of this Article relating to the action and powers of the Executive Council shall apply to the action and powers of the Body of Delegates.

"Article VI.

"Should any Contracting Power be found by the League to have broken or disregarded its covenants under Article V, it shall thereby ipso facto be deemed to to have committed an act of war against all the members of the League, which shall immediately subject it to a complete economic and financial boycott, including the severance of all trade or financial relations, the prohibition of all intercourse between their nationals and the nationals of the covenant-breaking State, and the prevention, so far as possible, of all financial, commercial, or personal intercourse between the nationals of the covenant-breaking State and the nationals of any other State, whether a member of the League or not.

"It shall be the duty of the Executive Council in such a case to recommend what effective military or naval force the members of the League shall severally contribute, and to advise, if it should think best, that the smaller members of the League be excused from making any contribution to the armed forces to be used against the covenant-breaking State.

"The covenant-breaking State shall, after the restoration of peace, be subject to the regulations with regard to a peace establishment provided for new States under the terms supplementary Article IV.

"Article VII.

"If any Contracting Power shall be found by the League to have declared war or to have begun hostilities or to have taken any hostile step short of war, against another Contracting Power before submitting the dispute involved to arbitrators or consideration by the Executive Council as herein provided, or to have declared war or to have begun hostilities or to have taken any hostile step short of war, in regard to any dispute which has been decided adversely to it by arbitrators the Contracting Powers hereby engage not only to cease all commerce and intercourse with that Power but also to unite in blockading and closing the frontiers of that Power to commerce or intercourse with any part of the world and to use any force which may be agreed upon to accomplish that object.

"Article VIII.

"Any war or threat of war, whether immediately affecting any of the Contracting Powers or not, is hereby declared a matter of concern of the League and to all the Contracting Powers, and the Contracting Powers hereby reserve the right to take any action that may be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace of nations.

"It is hereby also declared and agreed to be the friendly right of each of the Contracting Powers to draw the attention of the Body of Delegates or of the Executive Council to any circumstances anywhere which threaten to disturb international peace or the good understanding between nations upon which peace depends.

"The Body of Delegates and the Executive Council shall meet in the interest of peace whenever war is rumored or threatened, and also whenever the representative of any Power shall inform the Body of Delegates that a meeting and conference in the interest of peace is advisable.

"The Body of Delegates may also meet at such other times and upon such other occasions as they shall from time to time deem best and determine.

"Article IX.

"In the event of a dispute arising between one of the Contracting Powers and a Power not a party to this Covenant, the Contracting Power shall bring the matter to the attention of the Executive Council. The Executive Council shall in such a case, in the name of the League, invite the Power not a party to this Covenant to become ad hoc a party, and if that Power consents it is hereby agreed that the provisions hereinbefore contained and applicable to the submission of disputes to arbitration or to consideration shall be in all respects applicable to the dispute both in favor of and against such Power as if it were a party to this Covenant.

"In case the Power not a party to this Covenant shall not accept the invitation of the Executive Council to become ad hoc a party, it shall be the duty of the Executive Council immediately to institute an inquiry into the circumstances and merits of the dispute involved and to recommend such joint action by the Contracting Powers as may seem best and most effectual in the circumstances disclosed.

"Article X.

"If hostilities should be begun or any hostile action taken against the Contracting Power by the Power not a party to this Covenant before a decision of the dispute by arbitrators or before investigation, report and recommendation by the Executive Council in regard to the dispute, or contrary to such recommendation, the Contracting Powers engage thereupon to cease all commerce and communication with that Power and also to unite in blockading and closing the frontiers of that Power to all commerce or intercourse with any part of the world, and to employ jointly any force which may be agreed upon to accomplish that object. The Contracting Powers also undertake to unite in coming to the assistance of the Contracting Power against which hostile action has been taken, and to combine their armed forces in its behalf.

"Article XI.

"In case of a dispute between states not parties to this Covenant, any Contracting Power may bring the matter to the attention of the Body of Delegates or the Executive Council, who shall thereupon tender the good offices of the League with a view to the peaceable settlement of the dispute.

"If one of the states, a party to the dispute, shall offer and agree to submit its interests and cause of action wholly to the control and decision of the League, that state shall ad hoc be deemed a Contracting Power. If no one of the states, parties to the dispute, shall so offer and agree, the Body of Delegates shall through the Executive Council or of its own motion take such action and make such recommendation to the governments as will prevent hostilities and result in the settlement of the dispute.

"Article XII.

"Any Power not a party to this Covenant, whose government is based upon the principle of popular self-government, may apply to the Body of Delegates for leave to become a party. If the Body of Delegates shall regard the granting thereof as likely to promote the peace, order, and security of the World, they shall act favorably on the application, and their favorable action shall operate to constitute the Power so applying in all respects a full signatory party to this Covenant. This action shall require the affirmative vote of two-thirds of the Body of Delegates.

"Article XIII.

"The Contracting Powers severally agree that the present Covenant is accepted as abrogating all treaty obligations inter se which are inconsistent with the terms hereof, and solemnly engage that they will not enter into any engagements inconsistent with the terms hereof.

"In case any of the Powers signatory hereto or subsequently admitted to the League shall, before becoming a party to this Covenant, have undertaken any treaty obligations which are inconsistent with the terms of this Covenant, it shall be the duty of such Power to take immediate steps to procure its release from such obligations.

"SUPPLEMENTARY AGREEMENTS.

"I.

"To the colonies formerly part of the German Empire, and to those territories formerly belonging to Turkey which include Armenia, Kurdestan, Syria, Mesopotamia, Palestine and Arabia, which are inhabited by peoples not able to stand by themselves under the strenuous conditions of the modern world, there should be applied the principle that the well-being and development of such peoples form a sacred trust of civilization and that securities for the performance of this trust should be embodied in the constitution of the League.

"The best method of giving practical effect to this principle is that the tutelage of such peoples should be entrusted to advanced nations who by reason of their resources, their experience or their geographical position, can best undertake this responsibility, and that this tutelage should be exercised by them as mandataries on behalf of the League.

"The character of the mandate must differ according to the stage of development of the people, the geographical situation of the territory, its economic conditions and other similar circumstances.

"II.

"Certain communities formerly belonging to the Turkish Empire have reached a stage of development where their existence as independent nations can be provisionally recognized subject to the rendering of administrative advice and assistance by a mandatory power until such time as they are able to stand alone. The wishes of these communities must be a principal consideration in the selection of the mandatory power.

"Other peoples, especially those of Central Africa, are at such a stage that the mandatary must be responsible for the administration of the territory subject to conditions which will guarantee the prohibition of abuses such as the slave trade, the arms traffic and the liquor traffic, and the prevention of the establishment of fortifications or military and naval bases and of military training of the natives for other than police purposes and the defense of territory, and will also secure equal opportunities for the trade and commerce of other members of the League.

"There are territories, such as South-west Africa and certain of the Islands in the South Pacific, which, owing to the sparseness of their population, or their small size, or their remoteness from the centres of civilization, or their geographical contiguity to the mandatary state, and other circumstances, can be best administered under the laws of the mandatary state as if integral portions thereof, subject to the safeguards above-mentioned in the interests of the indigenous population.

"III.

"In every case of mandate, the mandatory state shall render to the League an annual report in reference to the territory committed to its charge.

"The degree of authority, control, or administration to be exercised by the mandatory State or agency shall in each case be explicitly defined by the Executive Council in a special Act or Charter which shall reserve to the League complete power of supervision, and which shall also reserve to the people of any such territory or governmental unit the right to appeal to the League for the redress or correction of any breach of the mandate by the mandatory State or agency or for the substitution of some other State or agency, as mandatory.

"The object of all such tutelary oversight and administration on the part of the League of Nations shall be to build up in as short a time as possible out of the people or territory under its guardianship a political unit which can take charge of its own affairs, determine its own connections, and choose its own policies. The League may at any time release such people or territory from tutelage and consent to its being set up as an independent unit. It shall also be the right and privilege of any people or territory to petition the League to take such action, and upon such petition being made it shall be the duty of the League to take the petition under full and friendly consideration with a view of determining the best interests of the people or territory in question in view of all circumstances of their situation and development.

"IV.

"No new State shall be recognized by the League or admitted into its membership except on condition that its military and naval forces and armaments shall conform to standards prescribed by the League in respect of it from time to time.

"V.

"The Contracting Powers will work to establish and maintain fair hours and humane conditions of labor for all those within their several jurisdictions and they will exert their influence in favor of the adoption and maintenance of a similar policy and like safeguards wherever their industrial and commercial relations extend. Also they will appoint Commissions to study conditions of industry and labor in their international aspects and to make recommendations thereon, including the extension and improvement of existing conventions.

"VI.

"The League shall require all new States to bind themselves as a condition precedent to their recognition as independent or autonomous States and the Executive Council shall exact of all States seeking admission to the League, the promise to accord to all racial or national minorities within their several jurisdictions exactly the same treatment and security, both in law and in fact, that is accorded the racial or national majority of their people.

"VII.

"Recognizing religious persecution and intolerance as fertile sources of war, the Contracting Powers agree, and the League shall exact from all new States and all States seeking admission to it the promise that they will make no law prohibiting or interfering with the free exercise of religion, and that they will in no way discriminate, either in law or in fact, against those who practice any particular creed, religion, or belief whose practices are not inconsistent with public order or public morals.

"VIII.

"When the rights of belligerents on the high seas outside territorial waters shall have been defined by international convention, it is hereby agreed and declared as a fundamental Covenant that no Power or combination of Powers shall have a right to overstep in any particular the clear meaning of the definitions thus established; but that it shall be the right of the League from time to time and on special occasion to close the seas in whole or in part against a particular Power or Powers for the purpose of enforcing the international Covenants here entered into.

"IX.

"It is hereby covenanted and agreed by the Contracting Powers that no treaty entered into by them shall be regarded as valid, binding, or operative until it shall have been published and made known to all the other States members of the League.

"X.

"It is further covenanted and agreed by the Contracting Powers that in their fiscal and economic regulations and policy no discrimination shall be made between one nation and another among those with which they have commercial and financial dealings.

"REPORT OF THE COMMISSION ON THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

[Preliminary peace conference.]

"1. TERMS OF REFERENCE.

"The Preliminary Peace Conference at the plenary session of the 25th January 1919 (Protocol No. 2) decided to nominate a Commission to work out in detail the Constitution and functions of a League of Nations.

"The terms of reference of this Commission were as follows:

"'The Conference, having considered the proposals for the creation of a League of Nations, resolved that—

"'1. It is essential to the maintenance of the world settlement, which the Associated Nations are now met to establish, that a League of Nations be created to promote international co-operation, to ensure the fulfillment of accepted international obligations and to provide safeguards against war.

"'2. This League should be treated as an integral part of the general Treaty of Peace, and should be open to every civilised nation which can be relied on to promote its objects.

"'3. The members of the League should periodically meet in international conference, and should have a permanent organization and secretariat to carry on the business of the League in the intervals between the conferences.

"'The Conference therefore appoints a Committee representative of the Associated Governments to work out the details of the constitution and functions of the League.'

"This Commission was to be composed of fifteen members, i. e. two members representing each of the Great Powers (United States of America, British Empire, France, Italy and Japan), and five members to represent all the Powers with special interests. At a meeting of these latter Powers on the 27th January, 1919, Belgium, Brazil, China, Portugal and Serbia were chosen to designate one representative each. (See Annex 6 of Protocol No. 2.)

"2. CONSTITUTION OF THE COMMISSION.

"The Commission was therefore originally composed as follows:

"For the United States of America:
- "The President of the United States of America.
- "Honorable Edward M. House.

"For the British Empire:
- "The Rt. Hon. the Lord Robert Cecil, K. C., M. P.
- "Lieutenant-General the Rt. Hon. J. C. Smuts, K. C., Minister of Defence of the Union of South Africa.

"For France:
- "Mr. Leon Bourgeois, former President of the Council of Ministers and Minister for Foreign Affairs.
- "Mr. Larnaude, Dean of the Faculty of Law of Paris.

"For Italy:
- "Mr. Orlando, President of the Council.
- "Mr. Scialoja, Senator of the Kingdom.

"For Japan:
- "Baron Makino, former Minister for Foreign Affairs, Member of the Diplomatic Council.
- "Viscount Chinda, Ambassador Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of H. I. M. the Emperor of Japan at London.

"For Belgium:
- "Mr. Hymans, Minister for Foreign Affairs and Minister of State.

"For Brazil:
- "Mr. Epitacio Pessoa, Senator, former Minister of Justice.

"For China:
- "Mr. V. K. Wellington Koo, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of China at Washington.

"For Portugal:
- "Mr. Jayme Batalha-Reis, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of Portugal at Petrograd.

"For Serbia:
- "Mr. Vesnitch, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of H. M. the King of Serbia at Paris.

"A request of four other Powers—Greece, Poland, Roumania and the Czecho-Slovak Republic—to be represented on the Commission was referred by the Conference to the Commission for consideration. Upon the recommendation of the Commission the four following members took their seats on February 6th:

"For Greece:
- "Mr. Eleftherios Veniselos, President of the Council of Ministers.

"For Poland:
- "Mr. Roman Dmowski, President of the Polish National Committee:

"For Roumania:
- "Mr. Diamandy, Roumanian Minister Plenipotentiary.

"For the Czecho-Slovak Republic:
- "Mr. Charles Kramar, President of the Council of Ministers.

"3. FIRST REPORT OF THE COMMISSION.

"Between the date of its appointment and the 14th February, the Commission met ten times. As a result of these meetings the following draft Covenant of the League of Nations was adopted, and read as a preliminary report by the Chairman at a plenary session of the Conference on the latter date (Protocol No. 3):

"'PREAMBLE.

"'In order to promote international co-operation and to secure international peace and security by the acceptance of obligations not to resort to war, by the prescription of open, just and honorable relations between nations, by the firm establishment of the understandings of international law as the actual rule of conduct among governments, and by the maintenance of justice and a scrupulous respect for all treaty obligations in the dealings of organized peoples with one another, the Powers signatory to this Covenant adopt this constitution of the League of Nations.

"'Article I.

"'The action of the High Contracting Parties under the terms of this Covenant shall be effected through the instrumentality of meetings of a Body of Delegates representing the High Contracting Parties, of meetings at more frequent intervals of an Executive Council, and of a permanent international Secretariat to be established at the Seat of the League.

"'Article II.

"'Meetings of the Body of Delegates shall be held at stated intervals and from time to time as occasion may require for the purpose of dealing with matters within the sphere of action of the League. Meetings of the Body of Delegates shall be held at the Seat of the League or at such other place as may be found convenient and shall consist of representatives of the High Contracting Parties. Each of the High Contracting Parties shall have one vote but may have not more than three representatives.

"'Article III.

"'The Executive Council shall consist of representatives of the United States of America, the British Empire, France, Italy and Japan, together with representatives of four other States, members of the League. The selection of these four States shall be made by the Body of Delegates on such principles and in such manner as they think fit. Pending the appointment of these representatives of the other States, representatives of shall be members of the Executive Council.

"'Meetings of the Council shall be held from time to time as occasion may require and at least once a year at whatever place may be decided on, or failing any such decision, at the Seat of the League, and any matter within the sphere of action of the League or affecting the peace of the world may be dealt with at such meetings.

"'Invitations shall be sent to any Power to attend a meeting of the Council at which matters directly affecting its interests are to be discussed and no decision taken at any meeting will be binding on such Power unless so invited.

"'Article IV.

"'All matters of procedure at meetings of the Body of Delegates or the Executive Council including the appointment of Committees to investigate particular matters shall be regulated by the Body of Delegates or the Executive Council and may be decided by a majority of the States represented at the meeting.

"'The first meeting of the Body of Delegates and of the Executive Council shall be summoned by the President of the United States of America.

"'Article V.

"'The permanent Secretariat of the League shall be established at which shall constitute the Seat of the League. The Secretariat shall comprise such secretaries and staff as may be required, under the general direction and control of a Secretary-General of the League, who shall be chosen by the Executive Council; the Secretariat shall be appointed by the Secretary-General subject to confirmation by the Executive Council.

"'The Secretary-General shall act in that capacity at all meetings of the Body of Delegates or of the Executive Council.

"'The expenses of the Secretariat shall be borne by the States members of the League in accordance with the apportionment of the expenses of the International Bureau of the Universal Postal Union.

"'Article VI.

"'Representatives of the High Contracting Parties and officials of the League when engaged on the business of the League shall enjoy diplomatic privileges and immunities, and the buildings occupied by the League or its officials or by representatives attending its meetings shall enjoy the benefits of extraterritoriality.

"'Article VII.

"'Admission to the League of States not signatories to the Covenant and not named in the Protocol hereto as States to be invited to adhere to the Covenant requires the assent of not less than two-thirds of the States represented in the Body of Delegates, and shall be limited to fully self-governing countries including Dominions and Colonies.

"'No State shall be admitted to the League unless it is able to give effective guarantees of its sincere intention to observe its international obligations, and unless it shall conform to such principles as may be prescribed by the League in regard to its naval and military forces and armaments.

"'Article VIII.

"'The High Contracting Parties recognize the principle that the maintenance of peace will require the reduction of national armaments to the lowest point consistent with national safety and the enforcement by common action of international obligations, having special regard to the geographical situation and circumstances of each State; and the Executive Council shall formulate plans for effecting such reduction. The Executive Council shall also determine for the consideration and action of the several governments what military equipment and armament is fair and reasonable in proportion to the scale of forces laid down in the programme of disarmament; and these limits, when adopted, shall not be exceeded without the permission of the Executive Council.

"'The High Contracting Parties agree that the manufacture by private enterprise of munitions and implements of war lends itself to grave objections, and direct the Executive Council to advise how the evil effects attendant upon such manufacture can be prevented, due regard being had to the necessities of those countries which are not able to manufacture for themselves the munitions and implements of war necessary for their safety.

"'The High Contracting Parties undertake in no way to conceal from each other the condition of such of their industries as are capable of being adapted to war-like purposes or the scale of their armaments, and agree that there shall be full and frank interchange of information as to their military and naval programmes.

"'Article IX.

"'A permanent Commission shall be constituted to advise the League on the execution of the provisions of Article VIII and on military and naval questions generally.

"'Article X.

"'The High Contracting Parties undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all States members of the League. In case of any such aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression the Executive Council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

"'Article XI.

"'Any war or threat of war, whether immediately affecting any of the High Contracting Parties or not, is hereby declared a matter of concern to the League, and the High Contracting Parties reserve the right to take any action that may be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace of nations.

"'It is hereby also declared and agreed to be the friendly right of each of the High Contracting Parties to draw the attention of the Body of Delegates or of the Executive Council to any circumstances affecting international intercourse which threaten to disturb international peace or the good understanding between nations upon which peace depends.

"'Article XII.

"'The High Contracting Parties agree that should disputes arise between them which can not be adjusted by the ordinary processes of diplomacy, they will in no case resort to war without previously submitting the questions and matters involved either to arbitration or to inquiry by the Executive Council and until three months after the award by the arbitrators or a recommendation by the Executive Council; and that they will not even then resort to war as against a member of the League which complies with the award of the arbitrators or the recommendation of the Executive Council.

"'In any case under this Article, the award of the arbitrators shall be made within a reasonable time, and the recommendation of the Executive Council shall be made within six months after the submission of the dispute.

"'Article XIII.

"'The High Contracting Parties agree that whenever any dispute or difficulty shall arise between them which they recognize to be suitable for submission to arbitration and which can not be satisfactorily settled by diplomacy, they will submit the whole subject matter to arbitration. For this purpose the Court of arbitration to which the case is referred shall be the court agreed on by the parties or stipulated in any Convention existing between them. The High Contracting Parties agree that they will carry out in full good faith any award that may be rendered. In the event of any failure to carry out the award, the Executive Council shall propose what steps can best be taken to give effect thereto.

"'Article XIV.

"'The Executive Council shall formulate plans for the establishment of a Permanent Court of International Justice and this Court shall, when established, be competent to hear and determine any matter which the parties recognize as suitable for submission to it for arbitration under the foregoing Article.

"'Article XV.

"'If there should arise between States members of the League any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, which is not submitted to arbitration as above, the High Contracting Parties agree that they will refer the matter to the Executive Council; either party to the dispute may give notice of the existence of the dispute to the Secretary-General, who will make all necessary arrangements for a full investigation and consideration thereof. For this purpose the parties agree to communicate to the Secretary-General, as promptly as possible, statements of their case with all the relevant facts and papers, and the Executive Council may forthwith direct the publication thereof.

"'Where the efforts of the Council lead to the settlement of the dispute, a statement shall be published indicating the nature of the dispute and the terms of settlement, together with such explanation as may be appropriate. If the dispute has not been settled, a report by the Council shall be published, setting forth with all necessary facts and explanations the recommendation which the Council think just and proper for the settlement of the dispute. If the report is unanimously agreed to by the members of the Council other than the parties to the dispute, the High Contracting Parties agree that they will not go to war with any party which complies with the recommendation and that, if any party shall refuse so to comply, the Council shall propose the measures necessary to give effect to the recommendation. If no such unanimous report can be made, it shall be the duty of the majority and the privilege of the minority to issue statements indicating what they believe to be the facts and containing the recommendations which they consider to be just and proper.

"'The Executive Council may in any case under this Article refer the dispute to the Body of Delegates. The dispute shall be so referred at the request of either party to the dispute, provided that such request must be made within fourteen days after the submission of the dispute. In any case referred to the Body of Delegates all the provisions of this Article and of Article XII relating to the action and powers of the Executive Council shall apply to the action and powers of the Body of Delegates.

"'Article XVI.

"'Should any of the High Contracting Parties break or disregard its covenants under Article XII, it shall thereby ipso facto be deemed to have committed an act of war against all the other members of the League, which hereby undertake immediately to subject it to the severance of all trade or financial relations, the prohibition of all intercourse between their nationals and the nationals of the covenant-breaking State, and the prevention of all financial, commercial, or personal intercourse between the nationals of the covenant-breaking State and the nationals of any other State, whether a member of the League or not.

"'It shall be the duty of the Executive Council in such case to recommend what effective military or naval force the members of the League shall severally contribute to the armed forces to be used to protect the covenants of the League.

"'The High Contracting Parties agree, further, that they will mutually support one another in the financial and economic measures which are taken under this Article, in order to minimize the loss and inconvenience resulting from the above measures, and that they will mutually support one another in resisting any special measures aimed at one of their number by the covenant-breaking State, and that they will afford passage through their territory to the forces of any of the High Contracting Parties who are co-operating to protect the covenants of the League.

"'Article XVII.

"'In the event of disputes between one State member of the League and another State which is not a member of the League, or between States not members of the League, the High Contracting Parties agree that the State or States not members of the League shall be invited to accept the obligations of membership in the League for the purposes of such dispute, upon such conditions as the Executive Council may deem just, and upon acceptance of any such invitation, the above provisions shall be applied with such modifications as may be deemed necessary by the League.

"'Upon such invitation being given, the Executive Council shall immediately institute an inquiry into the circumstances and merits of the dispute and recommend such action as may seem best and most effectual in the circumstances.

"'In the event of a Power so invited refusing to accept the obligations of membership in the League for the purposes of such dispute, and taking any action against a State member of the League which in the case of a State member of the League would constitute a breach of Article XII, the provisions of Article XVI shall be applicable as against the State taking such action.

"'If both parties to the dispute when so invited refuse to accept the obligations of membership in the League for the purposes of such dispute, the Executive Council may take such action and make such recommendations as will prevent hostilities and will result in the settlement of the dispute.

"'Article XVIII.

"'The High Contracting Parties agree that the League shall be entrusted with the general supervision of the trade in arms and ammunition with the countries in which the control of this traffic is necessary in the common interest.

"'Article XIX.

"'To those colonies and territories which as a consequence of the late war have ceased to be under the sovereignty of the States which formerly governed them and which are inhabited by peoples not yet able to stand by themselves under the strenuous conditions of the modern world, there should be applied the principle that the well-being and development of such peoples form a sacred trust of civilization and that securities for the performance of this trust should be embodied in the constitution of the League.

"'The best method of giving practical effect to this principle is that the tutelage of such peoples should be entrusted to advanced nations who by reason of their resources, their experience or their geographical position, can best undertake this responsibility, and that this tutelage should be exercised by them as mandataries on behalf of the League.

"'The character of the mandate must differ according to the stage of the development of the people, the geographical situation of the territory, its economic conditions and other similar circumstances.

"'Certain communities formerly belonging to the Turkish Empire have reached a stage of development where their existence as independent nations can be provisionally recognized subject to the rendering of administrative advice and assistance by a mandatory power until such time as they are able to stand alone. The wishes of these communities must be a principal consideration in the selection of the mandatory power.

"'Other peoples, especially those of Central Africa, are at such a stage that the mandatary must be responsible for the administration of the territory subject to conditions which will guarantee freedom of conscience or religion, subject only to the maintenance of public order and morals, the prohibition of abuses such as the slave trade, the arms traffic and the liquor traffic, and the prevention of the establishment of fortifications or military and naval bases and of military training of the natives for other than police purposes and the defense of territory, and will also secure equal opportunities for the trade and commerce of other members of the League.

"'There are territories, such as South-west Africa and certain of the South Pacific Islands, which, owing to the sparseness of their population, or their small size, or their remoteness from the centers of civilization, or their geographical contiguity to the mandatory state, and other circumstances, can be best administered under the laws of the mandatory state as integral portions thereof, subject to the safeguards above-mentioned in the interests of the indigenous population.

"'In every case of mandate, the mandatory state shall render to the League an annual report in reference to the territory committed to its charge.

"'The degree of authority, control, or administration to be exercised by the mandatory State shall if not previously agreed upon by the High Contracting Parties in each case be explicitely defined by the Executive Council in a special Act or Charter.

"'The High Contracting Parties further agree to establish at the seat of the League a Mandatory Commission to receive and examine the annual reports of the Mandatory Powers, and to assist the League in ensuring the observance of the terms of all Mandates.

"'Article XX.

"'The High Contracting Parties will endeavor to secure and maintain fair and humane conditions of labor for men, women and children both in their own countries and in all countries to which their commercial and industrial relations extend; and to that end agree to establish as part of the organization of the League a permanent Bureau of Labor.

"'Article XXI.

"'The High Contracting Parties agree that provision shall be made through the instrumentality of the League to secure and maintain freedom of transit and equitable treatment for the commerce of all States members of the League, having in mind, among other things, special arrangements with regard to the necessities of the regions devastated during the war of 1914–1918.

"'Article XXII.

"'The High Contracting Parties agree to place under the control of the League all international bureaux already established by general treaties if the parties to such treaties consent.

Furthermore, they agree that all such international bureaux to be constituted in future shall be placed under the control of the League.

"'Article XXIII.

"'The High Contracting Parties agree that every treaty or international engagement entered into hereafter by any State member of the League, shall be forthwith registered with the Secretary-General and as soon as possible published by him, and that no such treaty or international engagement shall be binding until so registered.

"'Article XXIV.

"'It shall be the right of the Body of Delegates from time to time to advise the reconsideration by States members of the League, of treaties which have become inapplicable, and of international conditions, of which the continuance may endanger the peace of the world.

"'Article XXV.

"'The High Contracting Parties severally agree that the present Covenant is accepted as abrogating all obligations inter se which are inconsistent with the terms thereof, and solemnly engage that they will not hereafter enter into any engagements inconsistent with the terms thereof.

"'In case any of the Powers signatory hereto or subsequently admitted to the League shall, before becoming a party to this Covenant, have undertaken any obligations which are inconsistent with the terms of this Covenant, it shall be the duty of such Power to take immediate steps to procure its release from such obligations.

"'Article XXVI.

"'Amendments to this Covenant will take effect when ratified by the States whose representatives compose the Executive Council and by three-fourths of the States whose representatives compose the Body of Delegates.'

"4. SUBSEQUENT MEETINGS OF THE COMMISSION.

"The draft Covenant of the 14th February was made public in order that discussion of its terms might be provoked. A great deal of constructive criticism followed upon its publication. Further suggestions resulted from hearings of representatives of thirteen neutral states before a Committee of the Commission on the 20th and 21st March.

"These various recommendations were taken under advisement by the Commission which held meetings on the 22nd, 24th and 26th March and on the 10th and 11th April. At the meeting of the 10th April a delegation representing the International Council of Women and the Suffragist Conference of the Allied countries and the United States were received by the Commission.

"5. FINAL REPORT OF THE COMMISSION.

"At the meetings of the 10th and 11th April the Commission agreed definitively on the following text of the Covenant to be presented to the Conference:

"'COVENANT OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

"'In order to promote international co-operation and to achieve international peace and security by the acceptance of obligations not to resort to war, by the prescription of open, just and honorable relations between nations, by the firm establishment of the understandings of international law as the actual rule of conduct among governments, and by the maintenance of justice and a scrupulous respect for all treaty obligations in the dealings of organized peoples with one another, the High Contracting Parties agree to this Covenant of the League of Nations.

"'Article I.

"'The original Members of the League of Nations shall be those of the Signatories which are named in the Annex to this Covenant and also such of those other States named in the Annex as shall accede without reservation to this Covenant. Such accession shall be effected by a Declaration deposited with the Secretariat within two months of the coming into force of the Covenant. Notice thereof shall be sent to all other Members of the League.

"'Any fully self-governing State, Dominion or Colony not named in the Annex, may become a Member of the League if its admission is agreed to by two-thirds of the Assembly, provided that it shall give effective guarantees of its sincere intention to observe its international obligations, and shall accept such regulations as may be prescribed by the League in regard to its military and naval forces and armaments.

"'Any Member of the League may, after two years' notice of its intention so to do, withdraw from the League, provided that all its international obligations and all its obligations under this Covenant shall have been fulfilled at the time of its withdrawal.

"'Article II.

"'The action of the League under this Covenant shall be effected through the instrumentality of an Assembly and of a Council, with a permanent Secretariat.

"'Article III.

"'The Assembly shall consist of Representatives of the Members of the League.

"'The Assembly shall meet at stated intervals and from time to time as occasion may require at the Seat of the League, or at such other place as may be decided upon.

"'The Assembly may deal at its meetings with any matter within the sphere of action of the League or affecting the peace of the world.

"'At meetings of the Assembly each Member of the League shall have one vote, and may have not more than three Representatives.

"'Article IV.

"'The Council shall consist of Representatives of the United States of America, of the British Empire, of France, of Italy, and of Japan, together with Representatives of four other Members of the League. These four Members of the League shall be selected by the Assembly from time to time in its discretion. Until the appointment of the Representatives of the four Members of the League first selected by the Assembly, Representatives of shall be members of the Council.

"'With the approval of the majority of the Assembly, the Council may name additional Members of the League whose Representatives shall always be members of the Council; the Council with like approval may increase the number of Members of the League to be selected by the Assembly for representation on the Council.

"'The Council shall meet from time to time as occasion may require, and at least once a year, at the Seat of the League, or at such other place as may be decided upon.

"'The Council may deal at its meetings with any matter within the sphere of action of the League or affecting the peace of the world.

"'Any Member of the League not represented on the Council shall be invited to send a Representative to sit as a member at any meeting of the Council during the consideration of matters specially affecting the interests of that Member of the League.

"'At meetings of the Council each Member of the League represented on the Council shall have one vote, and may have not more than one Representative.

"'Article V.

"'Except where otherwise expressly provided in this Covenant, decisions at any meeting of the Assembly or of the Council shall require the agreement of all the Members of the League represented at the meeting.

"'All matters of procedure at meetings of the Assembly or of the Council, including the appointment of Committees to investigate particular matters, shall be regulated by the Assembly or by the Council and may be decided by a majority of the Members of the League represented at the meeting.

"'The first meeting of the Assembly and the first meeting of the Council shall be summoned by the President of the United States of America.

"'Article VI.

"'The permanent Secretariat shall be established at the Seat of the League. The Secretariat shall comprise a Secretary General and such secretaries and staff as may be required.

"'The first Secretary General shall be the person named in the Annex; thereafter the Secretary General shall be appointed by the Council with the approval of the majority of the Assembly.

"'The secretaries and the staff of the Secretariat shall be appointed by the Secretary General with the approval of the Council.

"'The Secretary General shall act in that capacity at all meetings of the Assembly and of the Council.

"'The expenses of the Secretariat shall be borne by the Members of the League in accordance with the apportionment of the expenses of the International Bureau of the Universal Postal Union.

"'Article VII.

"The Seat of the League is established at Geneva.

"The Council may at any time decide that the Seat of the League shall be established elsewhere.

"'All positions under or in connection with the League, including the Secretariat, shall be open equally to men and women.

"'Representatives of the Members of the League and officials of the League when engaged on the business of the League shall enjoy diplomatic privileges and immunities.

"'The buildings and other property occupied by the League or its officials or by Representatives attending its meetings shall be inviolable.

"'Article VIII.

"'The Members of the League recognize that the maintenance of peace requires the reduction of national armaments to the lowest point consistent with national safety and the enforcement by common action of international obligations.

"'The Council, taking account of the geographical situation and circumstances of each State, shall formulate plans for such reduction for the consideration and action of the several Governments.

"'Such plans shall be subject to reconsideration and revision at least every ten years.

"'After these plans shall have been adopted by the several Governments, the limits of armaments therein fixed shall not be exceeded without the concurrence of the Council.

"'The Members of the League agree that the manufacture by private enterprise of munitions and implements of war is open to grave objections. The Council shall advise how the evil effects attendant upon such manufacture can be prevented, due regard being had to the necessities of those Members of the League which are not able to manufacture the munitions and implements of war necessary for their safety.

"'The Members of the League undertake to interchange full and frank information as to the scale of their armaments, their military and naval programmes and the condition of such of their industries as are adaptable to war-like purposes.

"'Article IX.

"'A permanent Commission shall be constituted to advise the Council on the execution of the provisions of Articles I and VIII and on military and naval questions generally.

"'Article X.

"'The Members of the League undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all Members of the League. In case of any such aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression the Council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

"'Article XI.

"'Any war or threat of war, whether immediately affecting any of the Members of the League or not, is hereby declared a matter of concern to the whole League, and the League shall take any action that may be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace of nations. In case any such emergency should arise the Secretary General shall on the request of any Member of the League forthwith summon a meeting of the Council.

"'It is also declared to be the friendly right of each Member of the League to bring to the attention of the Assembly or of the Council any circumstance whatever affecting international relations which threatens to disturb international peace or the good understanding between nations upon which peace depends.

"'Article XII.

"'The Members of the League agree that if there should arise between them any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, they will submit the matter either to arbitration or to inquiry by the Council, and they agree in no case to resort to war until three months after the award by the arbitrators or the report by the Council.

"'In any case under this Article the award of the arbitrators shall be made within a reasonable time, and the report of the Council shall be made within six months after the submission of the dispute.

"'Article XIII.

"'The Members of the League agree that whenever any dispute shall arise between them which they recognize to be suitable for submission to arbitration and which cannot be satisfactorily settled by diplomacy, they will submit the whole subject matter to arbitration.

"'Disputes as to the interpretation of a treaty, as to any question of international law, as to the existence of any fact which if established would constitute a breach of any international obligation, or as to the extent and nature of the reparation to be made for any such breach, are declared to be among those which are generally suitable for submission to arbitration.

"'For the consideration of any such dispute the court of arbitration to which the case is referred shall be the court agreed on by the parties to the dispute or stipulated in any convention existing between them.

"'The Members of the League agree that they will carry out in full good faith any award that may be rendered and that they will not resort to war against a Member of the League which complies therewith. In the event of any failure to carry out such an award, the Council shall propose what steps should be taken to give effect thereto.

"'Article XIV.

"'The Council shall formulate and submit to the Members of the League for adoption plans for the establishment of a Permanent Court of International Justice. The Court shall be competent to hear and determine any dispute of an international character which the parties thereto submit to it. The Court may also give an advisory opinion upon any dispute or question referred to it by the Council or by the Assembly.

"'Article XV.

"'If there should arise between Members of the League any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, which is not submitted to arbitration as above, the Members of the League agree that they will submit the matter to the Council. Any party to the dispute may effect such submission by giving notice of the existence of the dispute to the Secretary General, who will make all necessary arrangements for a full investigation and consideration thereof.

"'For this purpose the parties to the dispute will communicate to the Secretary General, as promptly as possible, statements of their case with all the relevant facts and papers, and the Council may forthwith direct the publication thereof.

"'The Council shall endeavor to effect a settlement of the dispute, and if such efforts are successful, a statement shall be made public giving such facts and explanations regarding the dispute and the terms of settlement thereof as the Council may deem appropriate.

"'If the dispute is not thus settled, the Council either unanimously or by a majority vote shall make and publish a report containing a statement of the facts of the dispute and the recommendations which are deemed just and proper in regard thereto.

"'Any Member of the League represented on the Council may make public a statement of the facts of the dispute and of its conclusions regarding the same.

"'If a report by the Council is unanimously agreed to by the members thereof other than the Representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute, the Members of the League agree that they will not go to war with any party to the dispute which complies with the recommendations of the report.

"'If the Council fails to reach a report which is unanimously agreed to by the Members thereof, other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute, the Members of the League reserve to themselves the right to take such action as they shall consider necessary for the maintenance of right and justice.

"'If the dispute between the parties is claimed by one of them, and is found by the Council, to arise out of a matter which by international law is solely within the domestic jurisdiction of that party, the Council shall so report, and shall make no recommendation as to its settlement.

"'The Council may in any case under this Article refer the dispute to the Assembly. The dispute shall be so referred at the request of either party to the dispute, provided that such request be made within fourteen days after the submission of the dispute to the Council.

"'In any case referred to the Assembly all the provisions of this Article and of Article XII relating to the action and powers of the Council shall apply to the action and powers of the Assembly, provided that a report made by the Assembly if concurred in by the Representatives of those Members of the League represented on the Council and of a majority of the other Members of the League, exclusive in each case of the Representatives of the parties to the dispute, shall have the same force as a report by the Council concurred in by all the members thereof other than the Representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute.

"'Article XVI.

"'Should any Member of the League resort to war in disregard of its covenants under Articles XII, XIII or XV, it shall ipso facto be deemed to have committed an act of war against all other Members of the League, which hereby undertake immediately to subject it to the severance of all trade or financial relations, the prohibition of all intercourse between their nationals and the nationals of the covenant-breaking State, and the prevention of all financial, commercial, or personal intercourse between the nationals of the covenant-breaking State and the nationals of any other State, whether a Member of the League or not.

"'It shall be the duty of the Council in such case to recommend to the several Governments concerned what effective military or naval force the Members of the League shall severally contribute to the armed forces to be used to protect the covenants of the League.

"'The Members of the League agree, further, that they will mutually support one another in the financial and economic measures which are taken under this Article, in order to minimize the loss and inconvenience resulting from the above measures, and that they will mutually support one another in resisting any special measures aimed at one of their number by the covenant-breaking State, and that they will take the necessary steps to afford passage through their territory to the forces of any of the Members of the League which are cooperating to protect the covenants of the League.

"'Any Member of the League which has violated any covenant of the League may be declared to be no longer a Member of the League by a vote of the Council concurred in by the Representatives of all the other Members of the League represented thereon.

"'Article XVII.

"'In the event of a dispute between a Member of the League and a State which is not a Member of the League, or between States not Members of the League, the State or States not Members of the League shall be invited to accept the obligations of membership in the League for the purposes of such dispute, upon such conditions as the Council may deem just. If such invitation is accepted, the provisions of Articles XII to XVI inclusive shall be applied with such modifications as may be deemed necessary by the council.

"'Upon such invitation being given the Council shall immediately institute an inquiry into the circumstances of the dispute and recommend such action as may seem best and most effectual in the circumstances.

"'If a State so invited shall refuse to accept the obligations of membership in the League for the purposes of such dispute, and shall resort to war against a Member of the League, the provisions of Article XVI shall be applicable as against the State taking such action.

"'If both parties to the dispute when so invited refuse to accept the obligations of membership in the League for the purposes of such dispute, the Council may take such measures and make such recommendations as will prevent hostilities and will result in the settlement of the dispute.

"'Article XVIII.

"'Every treaty or international engagement entered into hereafter by any Member of the League, shall be forthwith registered with the Secretariat and shall as soon as possible be published by it. No such treaty or international engagement shall be binding until so registered.

"'Article XIX.

"'The Assembly may from time to time advise the reconsideration by Members of the League of treaties which have become inapplicable and the consideration of international conditions whose continuance might endanger the peace of the world.

"'Article XX.

"'The Members of the League severally agree that this Covenant is accepted as abrogating all obligations or understandings inter se which are inconsistent with the terms thereof, and solemnly undertake that they will not hereafter enter into any engagements inconsistent with the terms thereof.

"'In case any Member of the League shall, before becoming a Member of the League, have undertaken any obligations inconsistent with the terms of this Covenant, it shall be the duty of such Member to take immediate steps to procure its release from such obligations.

"'Article XXI.

"'Nothing in this Covenant shall be deemed to affect the validity of international engagements such as treaties of arbitration or regional understandings like the Monroe Doctrine for securing the maintenance of peace.

"'Article XXII.

"'To those colonies and territories which as a consequence of the late war have ceased to be under the sovereignty of the States which formerly governed them and which are inhabited by peoples not yet able to stand by themselves under the strenuous conditions of the modern world, there should be applied the principle that the well-being and development of such peoples form a sacred trust of civilization and that securities for the performance of this trust should be embodied in this Covenant.

"'The best method of giving practical effect to this principle is that the tutelage of such peoples should be entrusted to advanced nations who by reason of their resources, their experience or their geographical position, can best undertake this responsibility, and who are willing to accept it, and that this tutelage should be exercised by them as Mandataries on behalf of the League.

"'The character of the mandate must differ according to the stage of the development of the people, the geographical situation of the territory, its economic conditions and other similar circumstances.

"'Certain communities formerly belonging to the Turkish Empire have reached a stage of development where their existence as independent nations can be provisionally recognized subject to the rendering of administrative advice and assistance by a Mandatary until such time as they are able to stand alone. The wishes of these communities must be a principal consideration in the selection of the Mandatary.

"'Other peoples, especially those of Central Africa, are at such a stage that the Mandatary must be responsible for the administration of the territory under conditions which will guarantee freedom of conscience or religion, subject only to the maintenance of public order and morals, the prohibition of abuses such as the slave trade, the arms traffic and the liquor traffic, and the prevention of the establishment of fortifications or military and naval bases and of military training of the natives for other than police purposes and the defence of territory, and will also secure equal opportunities for the trade and commerce of other Members of the League.

"'There are territories, such as South-west Africa and certain of the South Pacific Islands, which, owing to the sparseness of their population, or their small size, or their remoteness from the centers of civilization, or their geographical contiguity to the territory of the Mandatary, and other circumstances, can be best administered under the laws of the Mandatary as integral portions of its territory, subject to the safeguards above-mentioned in the interests of the indigenous population.

"'In every case of mandate, the Mandatary shall render to the Council an annual report in reference to the territory committed to its charge.

"'The degree of authority, control, or administration to be exercised by the Mandatary shall if not previously agreed upon by the Members of the League be explicitly defined in each case by the Council.

"'A permanent Commission shall be constituted to receive and examine the annual reports of the Mandataries and to advise the Council on all matters relating to the observance of the mandates.

"'Article XXIII.

"'Subject to and in accordance with the provisions of international conventions existing or hereafter to be agreed upon, the Members of the League

"'(a) will endeavor to secure and maintain fair and humane conditions of labor for men, women and children both in their own countries and in all countries to which their commercial and industrial relations extend, and for that purpose will establish and maintain the necessary international organizations;

"'(b) undertake to secure just treatment of the native inhabitants of territories under their control;

"'(c) will entrust the League with the general supervision over the execution of agreements with regard to the traffic in women and children, and the traffic in opium and other dangerous drugs;

"'(d) will entrust the League with the general supervision of the trade in arms and ammunition with the countries in which the control of this traffic is necessary in the common interest;

"'(e) will make provision to secure and maintain freedom of communications and of transit and equitable treatment for the commerce of all Members of the League. In this connection, the special necessities of the regions devastated during the war of 1914–1918 shall be borne in mind;

"'(f) will endeavor to take steps in matters of international concern for the prevention and control of disease.

"'Article XXIV.

"'There shall be placed under the direction of the League all international bureaux already established by general treaties if the parties to such treaties consent. All such international bureaux and all commissions for the regulation of matters of international interest hereafter constituted shall be placed under the direction of the League.

"'In all matters of international interest which are regulated by general conventions but which are not placed under the control of international bureaux or commissions, the Secretariat of the League shall, subject to the consent of the Council and if desired by the parties, collect and distribute all relevant information and shall render any other assistance which may be necessary or desirable.

"'The Council may include as part of the expenses of the Secretariat the expenses of any bureau or commission which is placed under the direction of the League.

"'Article XXV.

"'The Members of the League agree to encourage and promote the establishment and co-operation of duly authorized voluntary national Red Cross organizations having as purposes the improvement of health, the prevention of disease and the mitigation of suffering throughout the world.

"'Article XXVI.

"'Amendments to this Covenant will take effect when ratified by the Members of the League whose Representatives compose the Council and by a majority of the Members of the League whose Representatives compose the Assembly.

"'No such amendment shall bind any Member of the League which signifies its dissent therefrom, but in that case it shall cease to be a Member of the League.'

COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE SALARIES OF POSTAL EMPLOYEES.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] be appointed on the part of the Senate a member of the joint commission composed of Members of the two Houses from the Committees on Post Offices and Post Roads to investigate the salaries of postmasters and employees of the Postal Service. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] was a member of the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, but under the reorganization of committees he is no longer a member and has asked to be relieved from further service on that commission. I ask that his request be granted and that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] be appointed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The order as agreed to was reduced to writing, as follows:

Ordered, That the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] be appointed on the part of the Senate a member of the commission to investigate the salaries of postmasters and employees of the Postal Service, authorized in section 3 of the Post Office appropriation act approved February 28, 1919, vice Senator MCLEAN, resigned.

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate notify the House of Representatives thereof.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 8th instant, approved and signed the following acts:

S. 1361. An act further extending the time for the commencement and completion of the bridge or bridges authorized by an act entitled "An act to amend an act to authorize the Dauphin Island Railway & Harbor Co., its successors and assigns, to construct and maintain a bridge or bridges, or viaducts, across the water between the mainland, at or near Cedar Point, and Dauphin Island, both Little and Big; also to dredge a channel from the deep waters of Mobile Bay into Dauphin Bay; also to construct and maintain docks and wharves along both Little and Big Dauphin Islands," approved June 18, 1912, as extended by an act approved June 30, 1916; and

S. 1378. An act to authorize the Central Railroad Co. of New Jersey to construct a bridge across the navigable waters of the Newark Bay, in the State of New Jersey.

TRANSFER OF SHANTUNG TO JAPAN (S. DOC. NO. 72).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

TO THE SENATE:

I have received the resolutions of the Senate, dated July 15 and July 17, asking:

First, for a copy of any treaty purporting to have been projected between Germany and Japan, such as was referred to in the press dispatch enclosed, together with any information in regard to it which may be in possession of the State Department, or any information concerning any negotiations between Japan and Germany during the progress of the war. In reply to this resolution I have the honor to report that I know of no such negotiations. I had heard the rumors that are referred to, but was never able to satisfy myself that there was any substantial foundation for them.

Second, requesting a copy of any letter or written protest by the members of the American Peace Commission or any officials attached thereto, against the disposition or adjustment which was made in reference to Shantung, and particularly a copy of a letter written by General Tasker H. Bliss, Member of the Peace Commission, on behalf of himself, Hon. Robert Lansing, Secretary of State, and Hon. Henry White, Members of the Peace Commission, protesting against the provisions of the Treaty with reference to Shantung. In reply to this request, let me say that General Bliss did write me a letter in which he took very strong ground against the proposed Shantung settlement, and that his objections were concurred in by the Secretary of State and Mr. Henry White. But the letter can not properly be described as a protest against the final Shantung decision, because it was written before that decision had been arrived at, and in response to my request that my colleagues on the commission apprise me of their judgment in that matter. The final decision was very materially qualified by the policy which Japan undertook to pursue with regard to the return of the Shantung peninsula in full sovereignty to China.

I would have no hesitation in sending the Senate a copy of General Bliss's letter, were it not for the fact that it contains reference to other Governments, which it was perfectly proper for General Bliss to make in a confidential communication to me, but which I am sure General Bliss would not wish to have repeated outside our personal and intimate exchange of views.

I have received no written protests from any officials connected with or attached to the American Peace Commission with regard to this matter.

I am also asked to send you any memorandum or other information with reference to an attempt of Japan or her Peace Delegates to intimidate the Chinese Peace Delegates. I am happy to say that I have no such memorandum or information.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
8 August, 1919.

LANDED ESTATES OF AMERICANS IN MEXICO (S. DOC. NO. 71).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which, with the accompanying paper, was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed:

TO THE SENATE:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State in response to the resolution adopted by the Senate on June 19, 1919, in respect to the action taken by the United States with relation to the protection of landed estates of American citizens in Mexico.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
11 August, 1919.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, August 7, 1919.

The PRESIDENT:

The undersigned, the Secretary of State, has the honor to refer to the resolution adopted by the Senate on August 2, 1919, which is quoted below:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State inform the Senate what steps, if any, have been taken by the United States in protest or otherwise to the Mexican Government to prevent the threatened confiscation of landed estates owned by American citizens in said Republic under what is known as the "agrarian law" recently promulgated in the State of Sonora.

Attest:

GEORGE A. SANDERSON, Secretary.

And in reply to this resolution I have the honor to state that on July 16, 1919, having been informed that the Legislature of Sonora had passed a so-called agrarian law, the Acting Secretary of State telegraphed the American Embassy at Mexico City that the department's information indicated that the legislature had passed this law in substantially the same terms as a measure against which the embassy was instructed to protest in telegraphic instructions from the department sent on December 24, 1918. The embassy was further instructed to request the foreign office to advise it if the information in question was correct; to renew the protest against the measure made, pursuant to said instructions of December 24, 1918; and to conclude by urging that action be promptly taken to prevent the coming into force of a measure threatening confiscation of American interests. On July 17, 1919, the Acting Secretary of State sent telegraphic advices to the American consul at Nogales, Mexico, of the instructions to the American Embassy on July 16 and directed him to advice the appropriate State authorities that the embassy had been directed to renew the protest against the measure in question, referring in this connection to the specific grounds upon which the original protest had been made.

In further explanation of the matter, I have the honor to state that the grounds upon which the embassy was directed, on December 24, 1918, to protest against a proposed agrarian law then pending in the Sonora Legislature were that this measure was confiscatory in character and made no provision for due process of law and judicial determination in connection with the proposed expropriation of the lands affected thereby.

I have the honor further to state that since the said instructions of July 16, 1919, were dispatched to the American Embassy at Mexico City the Department of State has received from the American consul at Nogales a copy and translation of the so-called agrarian law and it is now studying the provisions of this law with a view to determining what further representations, if any, it should make to the Mexican Government regarding the matter.

Respectfully submitted.

ROBERT LANSING.

COST OF FOOD PRODUCTS.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I have received two letters from a Bridgeport, Conn., manufacturer in relation to the cost of living. I send them to the Secretary's desk and will ask the Senate to indulge me for about three minutes before the Secretary reads them to the Senate. I will ask the Secretary to omit reading the signature.

I wish to say, of course, the question of the cost of living is most complicated and may be viewed from many standpoints and many angles. I do not indorse all that my correspondent says in the two communications, but they show the difference in viewpoint. He directs his criticism mostly to the cost of wheat, which, in his opinion, is the basis of the cost of most of the other cereals, and hence of a great many food products the cost of which depends on that of cereals.

I realize perfectly well that wheat and other grains are the manufactured product of the farmer, but to the manufacturer they are merely the raw material of his industry. I desire these letters read as illustrating the way the country is divided into conflicting classes of people on this question and for the purpose of showing how interrelated all these different interests are which in the aggregate make up the conglomerate mass which we are called upon to estimate in advance and which is called public opinion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

BRIDGEPORT, CONN., August 4, 1919.

Hon. F. B. BRANDEGEE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We are all greatly interested in the high cost of living. So far as our business—the chemical line—is concerned, you will find that prices have returned to practically a prewar basis without any trouble. We are confronted with old-time conditions, but have to buy everything, aside from our own line, at abnormally high prices.

I have traveled considerably and talked to a great many people, and it is my opinion that the entire trouble with high prices can be settled offhand by reducing the price of wheat to the consumer to $1. I should judge that about 50,000,000 people outside of Congress are willing that the farmers should receive $2.26 per bushel for wheat for this year. When they receive it, we understand that there will be no competition, as the Government holds the entire supply. Therefore the Government has a perfect right to sell wheat at $1 per bushel, pocketing the loss, which it should do.

If necessary, another Liberty, or wheat, loan to cover this deficit could be floated, which we would all be glad to take.

The idea put up to Congress to sell wheat at the market price sounds to most of us like "bosh," as the price may go down slowly, according to the ability of the wheat gamblers to borrow enough money to keep the price up.

The Government-fixed price, to take effect September 1, will inevitably cause the fall of all other cereal prices, which, by the way, should be so, as the Government made no guaranty to keep up the price of all foodstuffs in the United States. We all know that the price of wheat controls the price of corn, barley, oats, and hay, which means the price of eggs, poultry, beef, and shoes. In keeping up the price of wheat, amounting to $2,000,000,000, it is also upholding about $10,000,000,000 worth of vital necessities. Herein lies the "joker" of the fixed price of wheat.

I appreciate the fact that the packers and their financiers keeping these stocks in storage will hold up their right hands and solemnly swear that it can not be done without breaking the country. It will assuredly break most of the speculators, but, to my mind, it is better to break the market and let us live than to have the entire country split by a revolution, which certainly threatens at the present time.

Outside of Washington, if you are in touch with the people, you will find that most of the country feels that there is no inducement to work hard when at the end of the week nine-tenths of them have not "broken even." This condition can not last without some violent upheaval, which may come this fall just before winter sets in, and will be a national calamity.

Why not have the Government at once set the price of wheat and break the market before it is too late?

The fall of these prices will, no doubt, stimulate European selling in an effort to keep up prices. This could be obviated by taking an average of three years' shipments of wheat, copper, and coal, say for the three years 1912, 1913, and 1914, and putting an embargo on all shipments in excess of that amount. This would take care of Europe's real needs and also limit the amount of credits to the nations that most of us feel can never pay, as our "horse sense" tells us that if they were in hard straits before the war on account of their national debts, they surely can not make good when they owe ten times the amount.

On account of the depreciation of foreign currency standards, which we believe is the basis of exchange, they can not afford to buy, if they want to, unless they intend to never pay their bills.

For instance, I would like to know how Germany can buy copper at 24 cents per pound and pay for it with a depreciated German mark, which would mean that they would be paying from $1 to $1.20 per pound, unless the exchange was juggled in such a way that some one lost the difference?

Regarding shoes; we come in contact with quite a few manufacturers of artificial leather, leather, etc., and at the present time no one seems to be able to buy hides enough. It does not seem necessary that the large dealers, such as the Chicago packers, should be allowed to ship all their hides to Europe. An embargo should be placed on shipments over the average of the three prewar years.

There are 100,000,000 people in this country who have to buy shoes. How can we do it unless these tremendous shipments are stopped or regulated? Talk will bring nothing but disaster, and greatly increase the feeling against the present administration, which is much more bitter than is indicated by the press.

We know that Europe is in desperate need of coal, also England can take care of its need by strict economy. We understand that lately the Government has taken over the output of the Cambria coal fields to insure the shipment of at least a million more tons of coal to Europe. Anyone who has been through the coal region knows that the miners will not, or can not, work more than half the time, thereby assuring a shortage this fall with higher prices. When the coal prices are ready to be boosted by the mine owners, the Government will work with them by shipping this coal out and taking enough coal out of the market to insure higher prices.

We also know that the sale of Government supplies, which should have been done months ago, was held up through official Washington to the detriment of the people. We also know that if it was sold at once it is only a drop in the bucket, as the supplies of food this fall run up to eight or ten billion dollars, and a hundred million does not go far. The main thing is that the Government should sell wheat at $1 per bushel, with embargoes to check the exports to a normal prewar average, nothing more.

I also note that Washington intends to tinker with the currency. Otherwise, reduce our money circulation, if possible, in the hope of checking the present inflation. The past history of the United States shows only one thing, viz, whenever the Government reduced the currency in any way it caused a panic, which it will do again.

We are not ready for a panic; only ready for sound legislation, which will cause the least disturbance and the least fright in the minds of the people. For instance, let the fact go broadcast through the country that the Government intends to reduce the currency, and see how fast each one of us tries to hide away our little share. Any fool knows what that would mean in 30 days.

I doubt very much if official Washington, which would expect to draw their pay just the same and would have enough to take care of themselves very well, feels as concerned as the rest of us who are out "in the cold" and depend upon the continued prosperity of the land to make a living.

I do not advocate the shooting of the packers, or other monopolists, as that will happen soon enough if this thing keeps on. They, no doubt, feel as secure in their position as Wilhelm II when he declared war; but to my mind he was in an infinitely stronger position than the men who are running this country in as arbitrary a way.

The pity and shame of it is that men who have every luxury possible can not visualize the untold suffering and injury they are doing to the mass of helpless people all over the country for the sake of greed, pure and simple, as the extra money they are getting can do them no good whatever when they already have everything they can possibly need.

Yours, very truly,

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the letter from the constituent of the Senator from Connecticut rather suggests to me the saying of the old humorist that he was willing in case of war to sacrifice all of his wife's relatives. He seems to be willing to have the Government buy large quantities of wheat and throw it upon the market for the purpose of depressing the market. I presume he would not be satisfied to have the Government go into the chemical market, he being a chemical manufacturer, and purchase any product in order to break the price.

It is rather notorious at the present time that wheat is selling in many markets in the United States for a price above the Government guaranty; it is also well understood that wheat is selling in the markets of Europe at very much higher than the American price, and it ought to be known to the author of this letter that the course of events within the last 60 days has deprived the United States of about 300,000,000 bushels of wheat that had been expected, so that the wheat crop for this year will be very much smaller than had been estimated in the spring. In my opinion, if wheat were left to the natural law of supply and demand the wheat producers would be receiving even more than they will receive under the Government guaranty.

I have not much patience with manufacturers or business men in one line who are forever complaining about the advanced prices of goods in other lines. The fact is that we are suffering now the results of war, and we will continue to suffer those results for some time from manifold causes, not only because production has been reduced but because the quantity of money, the supply of money, has been enormously increased. We can not expect in the United States with a per capita circulation of $56 the same prices that prevailed when the per capita circulation was $36, any more than they can in Europe with their enormous expansion of currency. I think such complaints and suggestions as are made by the manufacturer who is a constituent of the Senator from Connecticut are nothing more than the common clamor we hear of one class against another. They are complaints against what is inevitable under present conditions, conditions that will continue until we get back to normal, and a start to get back can not be made until the peace treaty is signed and we resume the ways of peace.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I do not agree at all with the last statement of the Senator. I do not think the signing of the peace treaty will have any effect whatever upon prices; but there is no use talking about that, because the President thinks the other way, or says he does.

I said, Mr. President, when I offered the communications that I did not agree with all the sentiments expressed by my correspondent, and I am still of the same opinion. I agree to a great extent with the Senator from Nebraska that each man looks at this situation largely with reference to himself and those circumstanced as he is. I stated that in the universal dissatisfaction at the high cost of living each man seems to think that his own product is selling at a fair price, but that what he has to buy is too dear.

The farmer may be getting a full price for his wheat. About that I do not know, for I do not come from a section of the country that produces much grain and I am not brought in close association with that question; but, as I understand my correspondent, his proposition is not to reduce the price of wheat to the farmer, but that the Government should buy the wheat crop and sell it to the people for a dollar a bushel. That may or may not be fantastic; it may or may not have some merit; I do not know; but, Mr. President, all I will say is this, that the farmer—and I am told there is no money for the farmer at present prices for wheat, at least in this section of the country, although I do not know about that—even if he is getting a fair price for his wheat, is affected by the high cost of living just as everyone else is, for everything that he has to buy has gone up. The price of rent has gone away up; the price of money which he owes on his mortgage has gone away up; the price of his agricultural implements and his fertilizers and his insurance and his food, other than what he raises on the farm, and everything that he uses has gone up. The price of labor is away up, and it is very difficult, as I am informed, to obtain farm labor at any price in certain sections of the country. In my opinion that is one thing that contributes to the high cost of food products—the fact that tremendous areas of the country have had to be abandoned from cultivation because it was impossible, during the war and until the Army shall be fully demobilized, to get farm labor at any price, and they have had to abandon the cultivation of large tracts of their land, and such labor as they do get is very high priced.

That is the farmer's position, as I understand. I have no patience with the man who wants to get everything as cheap as he can and sell his own product as dear as he can. It is human nature to be selfish, and in this great crush of conflicting interests everybody appears to be looking after himself; but it is our duty to try to arrive at some compromise measure which, to the best possibility of attaining the greatest good for the greatest number, will result in the greatest good for this whole country under these circumstances.

What that remedy is, of course, the committees of Congress are going to work out as best they can; but I do not think it is within human power or within the grasp of the human intellect, contemplating these tremendously differentiated and conflicting forces that are moving all over this country, for any one Senator or any one Representative to retire to his camera and take a piece of paper and indite upon it such words as will furnish a complete remedy for a situation which is perfectly abnormal and unprecedented not only here but all over the world. Time will be required to adjust these matters of great delicacy and intricacy, and patience on the part of the public will be required, too. They must realize, and the thinking portion of them I have no doubt do realize, that Senators and Representatives are just as human and just as fallible as the great mass of the public are, and that nobody here can empirically evolve out of his inner consciousness a single panacea which, at the stroke of a pen or the falling of the gavel of the presiding officer stating that the bill has passed, is going to work a miracle in a country distracted by all sorts of sequences of a tremendous world cataclysm such as we have been through. Patience and toleration and some self-sacrifice and a disposition not to swallow every gudgeon that is painted with rainbow hues, but to feel our way along, and possibly to experiment a little bit—that is necessary, because the conditions are unprecedented—are essential to the peaceful and wise and permanent solution of this tremendous question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the second letter presented by the Senator from Connecticut.

The Secretary read as follows:

BRIDGEPORT, CONN., August 7, 1919.

Hon. FRANK B. BRANDEGEE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I note with interest your letter of August 5, and greatly appreciate your acknowledgment of my complaint. After watching the news from Washington I feel that, except yourself, there is no "man of the hour," or no man in Washington big enough to stand up and advocate any definite plan for relief.

The only plan put up was that of the chief of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, and to the writer it is too bad that there is no Senator or Congressman big enough to stand up and meet his demands with a bill that will remove their chief cause of complaint at once, and will end for this time the argument as to whether the railroad employees shall run the United States or not.

As it stands to-day, with a vacillating Senate and House (as we see it), there is no answer to their demands except to temporize. Delay does not buy bread for their families, nor ours, nor those of our employees. Neither does it bring down the high prices.

Why not undertake to introduce a bill in the Senate yourself which will allow the United States to sell all the wheat in the country at $1 per bushel on September 1 and place an embargo on wheat for export, so that only a certain amount will leave the country during the next six months, with the added assurance that any man buying this wheat and holding it to bolster up the market, incidentally having the banks advance him money enough to carry it as a marginable proposition, will be prosecuted and imprisoned.

A bill of this kind, as I take it, is the only one that will stop the condition we are verging into, which is only anarchy.

President Wilson's proposed speech on Friday has no significance for most of us, as that is all we have heard for the past four years. We have seen no action. We all saw these high prices coming for months, but nothing was done.

You represent Connecticut. Take, for instance, Bridgeport. To-day the employees of about 25 factories in this city are on strikes, demanding wages that the firms can not pay and run, unless they again increase their prices, which they admit is impossible. They have the alternative of meeting the demands of the men and running their shops at a loss or closing the factories and letting the city drift into a state of riot. These continued strikes and resulting idleness can bring only one definite thing—disorder.

If the markets for foodstuffs can be broken inside of a week these strikers will have no excuse but to go back to work. Even from a capitalistic point of view the safest thing to do would be to break the wheat market regardless of what it will do.

I read with interest Mr. Barnes's report that this can not be done. I think that a man who handles United States Government money which is set aside to keep the cost of living down and then boasts that he has made the people pay $24,000,000 more for bread alone than was intended is no friend of the people but is simply misguided as to why he is there and should be fired as soon as possible for the good of the country.

The statement was made yesterday in Washington that corn and other supplies are not guided by the price of wheat and that statistics prove it. So far as I can see, statistics did prove that corn did not move exactly in the same ratio, but at the same time it was lower in price when wheat was lower.

If this is the case horse sense tells us to lower the price of wheat enough so that other foodstuffs can come down. Even the hucksters on the street have to charge more for their vegetables simply for the one item of feed for their horses, as it is four times what it was two years ago.

It is the accumulation of these little things on the backs of all of us that has closed down the factories of Bridgeport to-day. This has nothing to do with the determined front shown by the 2,000,000 railroad employees, who at least have heads in their organizations who are able to put a concrete proposition up and back it. Again I would say put up a concrete proposition in rebuttal—$1 wheat on September 1—and see what will happen.

Yours, very truly, ———— ————.

P. S.—This is my last letter, as I appreciate that there are many others who no doubt would like to gain your kind attention.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I want to remark that the gentleman who wrote that letter takes a most narrow view of the case. The cost of living refers to something more than the mere price of flour and bread. While the price of flour may be high, it does not compare with the price of boots and shoes and clothing. If the writer of the letter had looked abroad in New England, he would have found that the boot and shoe makers of New England charge a greater profit on their leather and boot and shoe goods than the farmers of the West charge for farm products; and if he had looked among the manufacturers of clothing and all the other necessaries of life he would have found that the farmers of the Northwest are getting less profit on their wheat than the manufacturers of New England are getting on their products.

The gentlemen who are making war on the farmers because of the cost of wheat and flour had better sweep their own front yards before they attack the farmers of the West.

INCOMES OF CERTAIN AMERICAN CORPORATIONS.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, Mr. Basil Manly read a paper before the National Conference of Social Work at Atlantic City on June 2, 1919. The address was not published in full, to my knowledge, except in one publication, but it created a great deal of comment, and some people were so interested in it that they felt that it ought to result in Mr. Manly being prosecuted, if possible, as an advocate of Bolshevism in this country. I call attention to this article in order that the Attorney General may investigate it. I think he will find in it considerable information which he would like to have concerning profiteers. He purports to give data and facts which, if they be well founded, are facts which the Attorney General ought to have.

I read a single paragraph:

> I have just completed a study of the earnings of 82 representative American corporations, a record of whose profits is available for each year from 1911 through 1918. This is not a list selected either because the profits were large or because the profits were small. It is a list of all the corporations whose earnings covering this entire period were available to me. A compilation of these figures shows that the same 82 corporations, which in the prewar years had an average net income of $325,000,000, had net incomes in 1916 amounting to more than $1,000,000,000, in 1917 of $975,000,000, and in 1918 of $736,000,000. This is after the deduction of every dollar of State and Federal taxes and of every conceivable charge which these companies could devise for reducing and concealing their apparent profits.
> I am convinced, as a result of my study, that the actual profits, even after the payment of taxes in 1917 and 1918, were just as great as in 1916, the difference being accounted for by the fact that in 1917 and 1918 these corporations set up all kinds of excessive reserves for depreciation, amortization, and other unspecified and fanciful contingencies for the purpose of evading taxation and concealing their excessive earnings from the public and the tax collector. But even taking the figures as they stand, we find that these 82 corporations earned, net, $3 in 1916 and 1917 and over $2 in 1918 for every dollar which they earned in the prewar period. This is profiteering with a vengeance, and the profiteers may well tremble lest the people avenge themselves for this shameless exploitation during a period of the Nation's greatest necessity.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment. All of this information is to be had by searching the records of the departments here, and while the address was condemned throughout the country as inciting the people to revolution, and so forth, my opinion is that it will be found that the facts as stated by Mr. Manly are correct; and if they are correct, the Attorney General will have something to begin with.

Mr. NELSON. What I desired to ask the Senator was whether he could give us any information as to who these companies are, their names, and what industries they are engaged in?

Mr. BORAH. I can only give the Senator general information.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The article was published in the RECORD of Friday, August 8, the names of the corporations given, and the full detail as to the profits of each one for the various years.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator will find it beginning on page 3703.

Mr. BORAH. I have made some examination of the matter, and the corporations cover almost every line of industry, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. FLETCHER. They are all given on pages 3704 and 3705 of the RECORD in the proceedings of Friday last.

Mr. BORAH. Very well.

RESTRICTION OF EXPORTS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask that Senate resolution 157 be laid before the Senate and read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution referred to by the Senator from Montana, which will be read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 157, submitted by Mr. MYERS on the 7th instant, as follows:

> Whereas the high cost of living, constantly increasing, with no prospect of a cessation or reduction, is a serious and constantly growing menace to the peace and welfare of the people of the United States and to the stability of the Government of the United States; and
>
> Whereas it is expedient and necessary for the Congress to find and provide a remedy for this serious state of affairs: Therefore be it
> Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and it is hereby, instructed and directed to consider forthwith and to report upon the advisability of legislation to restrict or prohibit for a time exports from the United States of food, clothing, hats, caps, leather goods, and other necessities of life; and if it may deem any such legislation advisable, to report to the Senate a proposed form of bill therefor and to make such suggestions in the premises as it may deem fit, and to advise the Senate generally in the premises.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I think one of the gravest crises that ever confronted the people of the United States now confronts them. I think it as grave as any that has ever arisen since the foundation of the Republic; quite as grave as any that confronted the people of this country during the Civil War or during the war with Germany and her allies. The rising cost of living in this country is engrossing the grave attention and deep concern of everybody, and all citizens who value the welfare of their country are seeking remedies for the distress that besets the country and the threatened disasters that are impending.

There is nothing cheap in this country to-day except money. Everything else is high. Our money, though, is depreciated. We have a 50-cent dollar when compared with its purchasing price of five years ago. Unless there is some relief, I believe there will be very serious trouble. Already the railroad employees of the country have demanded an increase of wages or a reduction of the cost of living. They have accompanied their demands by threats that unless one or the other is granted in a short time transportation will be tied up by a nation-wide railroad strike, and boldly threaten industrial paralysis, stagnation, and starvation of people.

I am not in favor of any increase of wages for railroad employees at this time. I do not believe an increase would be right or justifiable. The railroads are being operated by the Government at a tremendous loss—a loss, I believe, of about $30,000,000 a month, a million dollars a day. Passenger and freight rates have been increased enormously, so that they are a very heavy burden upon the people and add greatly to the increased cost of living. Still, with all that, there is a tremendous deficit of revenue which the taxpayers of the country have to pay for the operation of the railroads. I think, under those circumstances, it would be wholly unjustifiable to increase the pay of railroad employees. I believe the business of the country should be conducted as is the business of individuals. If an individual were conducting a business that was operated at a great loss, a business that was not nearly paying expenses, he would be considered a fit subject for a lunatic asylum if, under those circumstances, he should grant an increase of wages to his employees. I think the same principle should apply to the conduct of Government business. We owe a duty to the taxpayers. Railroads should be made to pay expenses before an increase of wages of employees is considered for a moment.

Unfortunately the demands of the chiefs of the brotherhoods of railway employees for an increase of wages have been accompanied by startling threats of railroad strikes, tie-ups, and industrial paralysis. I am always willing to lend a sympathetic ear to the complaints of workmen who are engaged in interstate commerce if they respectfully represent that they can not live comfortably on their wages and petition for an investigation of conditions, and under such conditions I am willing to favor investigation, but the demands and threats of the brotherhoods of railway employees in this instance resemble entirely too much the methods of a holdup to suit me. Congress is ordered to "stand and deliver," and if it does not deliver is threatened with dire disaster. I do not believe in yielding to any such demand.

Unfortunately for labor, that demand is also accompanied simultaneously with a demand that the industries of this country be sovietized, and a vast propaganda has been started to back up this demand. It is also accompanied by threats of revolution, of force, and of serious and dire disaster to the people if the demand is not granted by Congress. A nation-wide propaganda to back up this revolutionary demand has been inaugurated. Already I am in receipt of telegrams urging my support of what is known as the Sims bill, which embodies the so-called Plumb plan. The Plumb plan is simply a bold, bald, naked attempt to sovietize the railroads of this country; and I will say now to one and all that I am not in favor of the Sims bill and I shall not support it or anything like it. I am not willing to be a party to the sovietizing of the industries of this country. If the railroads were sovietized, ft would merely be an entering wedge to conducting the industries of this country for the benefit of a favored few. If the railroads were conducted by the railroad employees under the Plumb plan, the employees would fix their own wages; they would have the power to fix rates for passenger travel; to fix all freight rates and to regulate the amount of money to be taken from the people for the operation of the roads. The employees would be supreme. They would be absolute monarchs, with the power to take whatever they might choose from the people of this country. If they were allowed to do that, the next move would be to sovietize the steel industry, the mines, the manufacturing industries, and all of the other industries of this country. The American Republic would be thoroughly Russianized.

If the employees of an industry were allowed to fix their own wages and were allowed to tax the people of the country whatever they might choose in order to provide their wages and meet all expenses of conducting operations, how would the farmers of the country fare? How would the blacksmiths of the country fare? How would the merchants of the country fare? How would building contractors fare and those who work for them? Take the case of a man who is a building contractor and simply takes contracts where he can get them, here and there, to erect buildings. He is not conducting a factory or an established business that maintains on its pay roll at all times a large number of employees; his employees are dependent upon the success of his business for employment and for their pay. How would all such fare under such a system if it pervaded all of this country? I think it would be absolutely disastrous to all except the favored few who would fix their own wages in industry and fix the tax to be levied upon the people of the country in order to bring in the money with which to pay themselves. It would be un-American. It would be class legislation of the rankest kind. Farmers, live-stock men, lumbermen, merchants, tradesmen, contractors, and the great body of the people, the masses of the consumers, the majority, as in Russia, would be absolutely at the mercy of the minority, the favored few, who could fix their own wages and fix the prices of products. The cost of living would be higher than ever and intolerable.

Of course, those who advocate the plan say that the profits would be divided with the Government; but that phase of the matter is amusing. We all know about what the profits would be; it would not take a wheelbarrow to carry them, and yet if there were any loss sustained by the business the Government would be called upon to pay it. Under such a system each year the Congress would be confronted with a demand to appropriate millions and perhaps billions of dollars to foot the losses occurring in the operation of industries, and the Congress each year would have presented to it a threat that if it did not comply with the demand to appropriate money to foot the bills for losses dire disasters of various kinds would be brought upon the country. Members of Congress would undoubtedly be threatened that if they did not yield they would be put out of public life and others would be elected to fill their places who would yield to the demand and vote hundreds of millions or billions of the people's money to private interests to make up deficits. It would be a great game!

There has long been conducted in this country, I know, a sinister campaign to teach the people of this country the alleged beauties of Russian Bolshevism and sovietism—an insidious attack upon the institutions of this country. It has been conducted by mail, by literature, by addresses delivered in open and in secret, and by clubs which have been formed. The general network of this insidious propaganda has been thrown all over the country; it has been going on for a long time and those participating in it have been unusually bold and active for many months. I have been wondering who would take it upon himself or themselves to put in concrete form the issue of Bolshevism in this country. I knew that so long as it was only advocated in a general way, in an abstract way, no harm could come from it directly; I knew that it could not be applied to the institutions of this country and put into practice when only taught abstractly. I knew that some concrete proposition had to be presented to the people in order to make it an issue; but the veil of mystery has been lifted at last, and I am sorry to say it falls to the leaders of the railroad brotherhoods to present to the people of this country a concrete test of Bolshevism against Americanism. The test is upon us; we have on our hands right now the test of Bolshevism against Americanism, and, so far as I am concerned, I am ready for the test. Those who have precipitated it have threatened that the Members of Congress who do not support their proposal will be retired to private life and will be succeeded by others who do favor this plan to sovietize the industries of the country.

So far as I am concerned, I am quite ready and willing at any time to sacrifice my political life for the welfare of my country, and I will sacrifice it rather than be a party to binding this country hand and foot and turning it over to Bolshevism to sovietize American industries. Such threats have no terror for me. I am quite willing at any time, if necessary, to die politically for my country; indeed, that would be a small sacrifice compared to the sacrifice of hundreds of thousands of American citizens who have given their physical lives from the time of the Revolutionary War down to the present time in order that the principles of this Government might survive. Hundreds of thousands of Americans sacrificed their lives in the Revolutionary War, the War of 1812, the Mexican War, the Civil War, the Spanish-American War, and the war with Germany and her allies. They died that American institutions might live. More than that, I would not only be willing to sacrifice my political life but to sacrifice my physical life rather than to see this Government destroyed. Then I should be willing to do no less than thousands upon thousands of patriotic citizens before me have done.

The test of Bolshevism against Americanism is confronting us right now and must be met and decided. There is no middle ground; it can not be side-stepped or dodged any more than the issue of slavery could be side-stepped or dodged when it was brought to the fore. Politicians side-stepped and dodged the slavery question for generations; the Democratic Party of the North and the Whig Party of the South temporized with it and dodged it and took evasive stands upon it for many years. Finally it had to be met and settled. So this issue must be settled, and the sooner the better. Now is the best time.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMOOT in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. MYERS. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. NELSON. Does not the Senator from Montana think it would have been well if the administration three years ago had taken the stand it has now taken?

Mr. MYERS. Three years ago?

Mr. NELSON. Yes; when the railroad trainmen came before Congress and the President just about in the same attitude that they did recently. Would it not have been advisable then to have put on the brakes instead of letting it go on, instead of sowing the wind and now reaping the whirlwind?

Mr. MYERS. It might have been. However, there were very different conditions at that time, and the nature of the demands at that time was very different from those now made.

Mr. NELSON. Was not the trouble then that there was an election pending that fall?

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I will say that there is an election pending now. There is an election pending next year. Elections are always pending in this country, and there are people who look forward to elections at all times. If Congress made one mistake, I do not believe it would be any justification for Congress to make another and a far greater mistake. If the railroad brotherhoods held up this country once, I do not believe it would be any justification for yielding to a holdup demand now. I believe that the issue of who shall conduct the affairs of this country is more clearly and concisely presented to the people of the country now than it ever was before, and I believe that it should be met fairly and squarely.

As I was saying, on the slavery question——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to his colleague?

Mr. MYERS. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If my colleague will permit me, before he passes from the subject he was speaking about in reply to the inquiry of the Senator from Minnesota, I feel that the difference between the situation which now confronts us and that which confronted us in 1916 ought to be made very clear. I voted for the legislation enacted in 1916. I do not know what attitude the Senator from Minnesota took with respect to it.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question in that connection? Did not the railroad trainmen come then with a threat of a strike, as they have done recently?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That was just the point to which I desired to address myself.

Mr. NELSON. Did they not hold the threat up to our throats?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. NELSON. And did they not say that unless we would acquiesce in that legislation they would strike and hold up everything in the country?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly; and that is just the question to which I desire to address myself. So they did, and the country was confronted with a great catastrophe, and it was confronted with a great catastrophe because no machinery had been provided at that time through which the justice or the injustice of the claims then made could be determined.

Mr. NELSON. Oh, Mr. President, we had an arbitration board.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly; we had an arbitration board that the railroad companies refused to resort to. That is the situation. The railroad men offered to submit their cause to that board of arbitration, and the railroads of the country declined to arbitrate, as they had an opportunity to do. Congress had failed to provide the machinery by which the matter could be determined; but, Mr. President, it has since done so. Under the existing law a board under the Railroad Administration has been created which is fully empowered by the Legislature to hear and determine the justice of the claim now made. Accordingly we occupy an entirely different situation.

Mr. NELSON. Oh, no, Mr. President. I want to say to the Senator that we could have enacted legislation then providing for a board to consider the question of wages. We could have said then, "Before you strike you must submit your demands to this arbitration board," and we could have created a board, and that is what we ought to have done at that time—created a board. The only relief we can hope for is to provide some system by which we will require these railroad men or any other men connected with our transportation systems, before they strike, to submit the question to some board of arbitration and have it passed upon. That is the only relief possible, and that system you could have provided three years ago without acquiescing in the other matters that were contained in that bill.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Without taking issue with the Senator from Minnesota—whom I admire too much to have any controversy at all with—I will state that I rose merely to indicate that the situation that confronts us now is essentially and vitally different from the situation that confronted us in 1916. Moreover, I do not recall now that the Senator from Minnesota or any Senator upon the other side of the Chamber, when the legislation to which reference has been made came before the Senate in 1916, proposed as a substitute for that legislation a system of compulsory arbitration. Practically everybody at that time recognized that, unfortunate as the situation was, there was only one solution to it, and that was to enact the legislation which was enacted. There was practically a unanimous agreement upon that point. But in any case, Mr. President, the situation arose by reason of the fact that Congress had not legislated in order that the situation might be taken care of. Congress went to work and legislated, and the situation can be taken care of now in the way in which it is being taken care of—by a board acting under the Railroad Administration.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, the demand of the railroad brotherhoods in 1916 was not a demand for an increase of wages. It was a demand for an eight-hour labor day, such as had been given to labor in nearly all other lines of industry. It was a question of hours, not of wages. As my colleague did, I voted for the Adamson law in 1916. I had long believed in an eight-hour day in all industries. At that time the railroads as a whole were not losing money, either. If that was a holdup, as the Senator from Minnesota seems to believe, it is no excuse for another and far worse holdup, and I will say that never in future will any legislation, as the result of a holdup, be enacted in Congress by the aid of my vote.

I have always been sympathetic with all legitimate and reasonable requests of labor. Since I have been in this body I have voted for nearly everything that labor has requested of Congress. There are few Members of this body who have voted for more legislation to alleviate the conditions of labor than I. I have done that because I have had a sincere desire to give to labor a full measure of social and economic justice and a fair proportion of the prosperity and benefits of this country and because I wanted to deal fairly and justly with labor. I have wanted, and I want now, labor to have fair treatment, but when it comes to a demand to sovietize the industries of this country, to turn this country over to Bolshevism and socialism, and to overturn the rights of property and the established principles of this Government, or as a threatened alternative to bring upon this country chaos, revolution, revolt, industrial stagnation, paralysis of industry, starvation of American citizens, I start a little revolution of my own. It is revolting to my sense of justice, my Americanism, and I revolt against it here and now.

If labor is going to back up this demand to sovietize the industries of this country, it will find that many sympathizers who have heretofore stood with it in all reasonable and legitimate matters and in many past contests, giving to it, as I did on the Adamson bill, the benefit of any doubt, can not be counted upon to support it in such extraordinary and revolutionary demands as are now being made by some representatives of labor. I doubt if the rank and file of the railroad men of this country are at heart in favor of the proposition to sovietize the industries of this country. I believe this crisis has been brought upon the country by the leaders of the railroad brotherhoods. I believe they have moved together concertedly to precipitate upon this country, at a great crisis in its existence, the demand that is now made upon Congress. It looks like they had long determined to act at an opportune time.

I read yesterday in the Washington Post a very sensible article by Mr. Thomas C. Atkeson, Washington representative of the National Grange. Among other things, he said:

> The hysterical wave of protest against the high cost of living which broke out this week came at a suspiciously opportune time to influence Congress in favor of the so-called Plumb plan, and no denials from interested sources can hide this suspicious timeliness.

It appears to me very suspicious that the demand for an increase of wages and the demand to sovietize the industries of this country came like a thunderclap upon Congress at the same time; launched at the same time, in one and the same breath, you might say, and both backed up by more or less insinuating threats that unless they were granted there would be revolution, anarchy, stagnation, and industrial paralysis in this country. There has been some effort made, in the last day or two, to separate the demands, to show that the threat of a strike was only made to back up the demand for an increase of wages and not to enforce the demand to sovietize the industries of this country; and yet the leaders of the railroad brotherhoods last week issued a statement in which they said that the railroad employees of this country were in no temper to brook the return of the railroads to their owners. Now, if language means anything, that means that they will not tolerate it, that they will not permit it, that they will prevent it in one way or another. They have done some reckless talking. One of the railroad brotherhood chiefs also said that if Congress should follow a certain policy suggested by President Wilson the railroads would be tied up so tight that they would never run again—would never run again. That means a long time. I do not see how that could occur unless the railroads of the country were destroyed, unless their property should be physically destroyed.

This crisis has been launched, it appears to me, as a climax to a long-continued system of agitation to overthrow American institutions and the principles of a republican form of government, to overthrow the rule of all the people and establish rule by a few people for the benefit of a few. I am opposed to class legislation for the benefit of a few people. It does not make any difference whether the few to be benefited by it at the expense of the many are laboring people or capitalists.

I have all of my life stood against class legislation for the benefit of a few, and I still maintain that stand. I do not care who it is that demands special privileges and class legislation for the benefit of the few at the expense of the many. I am just as much opposed to it to-day as I ever was, and I am just as much opposed to it for the benefit of one class as for another. I say that Congress should set its face as a flint rock against this audacious demand of representatives of a few people of this country to sovietize the industries of the United States for the benefit of a class. I am satisfied that the propaganda for this revolutionary demand is only beginning, and that it will be conducted into and through the next campaign. Many will join in it. Thousands will support it.

We may expect every rampant Socialist, every I. W. W., every Bolshevist, every soviet, every long-haired man and short-haired woman who wants to Russianize this country to put himself or herself back of this propaganda and to bring to bear in support of it all of the power and agitation possible. As far as I am concerned, my back is against the wall. Not one inch will I yield to this audacious demand to sovietize the industries of this country. It can get no support from me. Being opposed to the plan to sovietize the industries of the country, and not believing that it would be fair or just at this time to increase wages of railroad employees, when the Government, in spite of high freight and passenger rates is paying out millions of dollars a month to foot the deficits of the railroads, I can not favor either of those demands.

However, I am very heartily in sympathy with the demands of railroad employees, as well as of all other employees and all other classes of people, that something be done to reduce the enormously high cost of living, which is constantly rising and mounting higher and higher. I am in favor of reducing the cost of living, if possible, for the benefit of railroad employees, for the benefit of all other employees, and for the benefit of every individual—the whole people and not any one class. I insist that Congress should do something about this. If it does not effect some reduction in the cost of living, I predict that there will not only be strikes but riots, insurrection, looting, and destruction of property in this country on a scale never before known in its history. I claim that the Congress should not spurn any suggestion which appears to have any merit or any possible hope of relief in it, which may appear calculated to protect the welfare and to benefit the entire people, and therefore I have introduced the pending resolution. It is to direct the Committee on the Judiciary to give consideration to the advisability of legislation to restrict or prohibit, for a time, exports from the United States of food, clothing, hats, caps, leather goods, and any other necessities of life.

I do not think that we should allow the people of this country to be bled white for the benefit of the people of the rest of the world and for the benefit of the few in this country who make enormous profits out of exports from this country. I read from the Washington Post of this morning this article:

Increase in exports of food and other commodities during the last 12 months caused a gain of 262 per cent in the number of cars of export freight received at North Atlantic ports during the week ended July 30 over the number received during the corresponding week of 1918.

A traffic report issued Saturday by Director General of Railroads Hines showed a total of 5,825 cars received during this year, compared with 1,607 received for the corresponding week last year.

When we were at war and were furnishing those associated with us in Europe with a large proportion of their munitions, clothing, food, and other necessities for the sustenance of life and the conduct of the war exports were far less than now. The increase of our exports is enormous, startling, and unwholesome. It is bleeding this country of the necessities of life. We should not allow the people of this country to face starvation merely for the benefit of people in other countries. I believe in giving a sympathetic degree of attention to the wants and needs of people who are suffering in other parts of the world, but we should consider ourselves first. I believe in America first. When we shall have looked after the welfare of our own people, then I say let us give a humane and sympathetic measure of attention to the welfare of the people of the rest of the world.

We all know that our exports are greater now than they ever were before, and no doubt many of those exports are being paid for by money that we have furnished gratis or loaned to the people of European governments. No doubt many of those exports are being paid for with our own money, out of the ten billions of dollars that we authorized to be loaned to foreign governments and out of the hundred million dollars that we voted last fall for food for people in European countries. I also understand that many of those exports are being sold in Europe at figures lower than those being charged for articles of the same nature in this country. That may be very profitable to a few profiteers in this country, who are reaping the benefits, the immense profits on these vast exports. But it is bringing face to face with deprivation millions of people in this country, and I do not believe we should require our own people to face want in order to show a humane interest in people of other countries. I am for America first. America comes first with me. I believe our first duty is to look after the welfare of our own people.

I understand the reason why shoes are so high in this country, and are mounting higher and higher, is that Italy has bought up practically all of the leather in this country. I understand that shoes next year will probably be double the price they are this year. At a meeting of manufacturers of men's clothing, held a few weeks ago, the chairman of the meeting declared that in his opinion men's clothing next year would cost twice what it costs this year. Are we going to see those things go on interminably, indefinitely, without making any effort to look after the welfare of our own people? Are we going to allow our people to face want, and are we going to have to deal with threats of strikes, and revolution, and industrial paralysis, and stagnation of business, and actual suffering, without turning our attention to some method of stopping that extraordinary condition of affairs?

This resolution merely refers the matter for investigation to the Committee on the Judiciary. It does not initiate any legislation. It does not commit the Senate to anything; it merely asks for a study of the matter and report on it by the Committee on the Judiciary; and I think it is supported by common sense.

In the good old days, when the average, all-round farmer raised a crop, in the fall, when he would harvest his crop, he would first lay in enough supplies to last him and has family through the winter, and probably through the year, before selling any. If he had apples, he would put enough apples in his cellar to last his own family and employees during the winter, or probably a year, before selling any. Then he would sell the balance. If he raised potatoes, he would store enough potatoes in the cellar to supply his own family through the coming year, and then he would sell the balance, sell what he could afford to sell. If he raised pork, when hog-killing time came he would salt down and put away enough pork to last his own family, to supply his own table, and to feed the family and employees during the coming year, and then sell the balance.

I claim that is a common-sense business principle, and I contend that the United States should do the same. We should first see that our own people are clothed and fed at a reasonable cost, and then export and furnish to the rest of the world what remains of our products. We should not require our people to compete with the whole world, even with our enemies, and to pay enormous, unconscionable prices for the barest necessities of life in sufficient quantities merely to keep away starvation.

I believe this is worth while for the Judiciary Committee to consider and report upon. I would not favor putting a Chinese wall around this country and cutting off all exports, but the exportation of some of the necessities of life I believe could well be restricted in part for a time, at least until we get down to a normal condition of affairs.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the subject which the Senator is discussing, namely, the wisdom or propriety of applying an embargo upon exports, is one which has received considerable attention of late. I want to suggest to the Senator, however, some of the dangers that would result and some of the evils that inevitably would follow the establishment of an embargo upon foodstuffs and the other articles which we are now shipping to Europe.

Our exports during the past month were $938,000,000, the month before eight hundred and some odd millions, and the month before $763,000,000. The Senator must realize that when we export we must import. When we export it means that we have a surplus of certain products. Many of those things which we exported were finished products, the products of factories, consisting of shoes, clothing, and other goods, as well as foodstuffs. The result is that if we cut off exports absolutely it would mean a congestion here in our markets, a glut in nearly all the industries of the United States.

Mr. MYERS. I will say to the Senator that I do not favor cutting off exports absolutely.

Mr. KING. It would mean that factories would close down, thousands and hundreds of thousands of men and women would be thrown out of employment. Every time you restrict exportation you are injuring somebody at home; you are damming the stream of productivity to the extent of the embargo.

I can conceive of cases where the interests at home are so imperative that an embargo is wise. I can conceive that the supply of foodstuffs may be so short at home that we ought to impose an embargo in order to prevent hardship and famine and serious injury, physical and otherwise, to our domestic concerns and to our own people. Yet I suggest to the Senator that when the Government attempts to lay an embargo it is playing with fire. How far will it go? Where will it stop?

If an embargo is laid upon wheat, somebody will insist that an embargo be laid upon corn, or upon bacon, or upon shoes, or upon cotton, and soon you would be deluged with importunities for an embargo upon the products of our country, and the result would be, as I stated, that importations would be cut off, the channel by which a market is found for our surplus would be cut off, and it reacts immediately upon the people at home; there would be unemployment in thousands of our cities and towns. You would dislocate business, disturb our domestic affairs, and perhaps in the end cause more harm than do good.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, that was the result of Thomas Jefferson's embargo.

Mr. KING. As the Senator from Colorado calls to my attention, that was a policy which was pursued in the time of Mr. Jefferson. Mr. Jefferson examined this subject very fully, and they placed an embargo then with respect to exportations from abroad, and an embargo really from one port to another within the United States, which resulted in hardship, which bankrupted many of the localities or sections of the country, and, indeed, bankrupted in part the country.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah is a member of the Judiciary Committee of this body. I would be very glad to have his views and the views of the other members of that important committee on this subject. If the views he has now expressed should be his ultimate views I would be glad to have him express them, in conjunction with other members of that committee, in a composite report to the Senate of the views of that committee on this subject. That is all this resolution asks. This is a most vital matter. We need all the light and deliberation we may be able to obtain.

There can be no harm in getting light on the subject. No harm can come from getting light from such an eminent body as the Judiciary Committee of the Senate. That is what we have the committee for; to get its views on important matters, such as this, and that is all this resolution asks. I think there should be no objection to the resolution.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, in corroboration of the suggestion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] that the movement which took its final form in the demand of the various railroad organizations for the passage of what is known as the Plumb plan is similar in its nature to what we have come to denominate as the Bolshevist movement in this country, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the publication this morning of the names of some of the active members of the press bureau in charge of publicity for the Plumb plan:

Lincoln Colcord, former associate editor of the Nation, whose radical writings have often been the subject of public comment, is a member of the press bureau. He is a close personal friend and coworker of William C. Bullitt, the agent who was supposed to represent the American delegation to the peace conference on a mission to Lenin and Trotski, and that unfortunate mission, together with unexplained "leaks" of official documents bearing upon relations between this Government and the leaders of the Bolsheviki of Russia, is about to be made a subject of investigation, it is reported, by the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate in connection with its consideration of the peace treaty.

RADICALS IN GROUP.

Herbert B. Brougham, a member of the coterie which includes Messrs. Bullitt and Colcord, is the personal assistant to Glenn E. Plumb, the latter avowedly the chief propagandist of the plan which bears his name.

Raymond Swing, who was the correspondent of a Chicago newspaper in Germany during the time that nation was at war and this Nation remained a neutral, is in charge of the Plumb press bureau, and Ray McClung is one of his assistants. Altogether the personnel constitutes probably the strongest body of exponents of radical propaganda that could be gathered together in this country, but none of them is in any way identified with the railroad brotherhoods or with organized labor in any manner.

Mr. President, on Thursday last I caused to be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an editorial, which bears somewhat upon the same question that the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] has been discussing, from the New York Times of May 30, 1919. It was printed on page 3700 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 7, 1919, headed "An apology due," and is as follows:

[From the New York Times, May 30, 1919.]

AN APOLOGY DUE.

Senator POINDEXTER in his place in the Senate charged the President with having delivered to the Congress on December 4, 1917, an address in which he spoke of the Bolshevist government in Russia as "worthy of the admiration of every lover of mankind." On December 4, 1917, the Kerensky government had been overthrown, but the Bolshevist government was not effectively set up, the social democrats still having a considerable voice in it. It was not until over a month later that they dispersed the constituent assembly by force and embarked on the wild career of absolutism.

On December 4, 1917, the President did deliver an address to Congress. Its purpose was to ask for a declaration of war against Austria-Hungary. We find in it very little about Russia. He did say that if the real issues had been made plain from the beginning "the sympathy and enthusiasm of the Russian people might have been once for all enlisted on the side of the Allies, suspicion and distrust swept away, and a real and lasting union of purpose effected."

Is that what Senator POINDEXTER means? It does not sound much like his quotation. The President also said:

"The Russian people have been poisoned by the very same falsehoods that have kept the German people in the dark, and the poison has been administered by the very same hands."

That does not sound much like Senator POINDEXTER'S quotation. Yet these two sentences are the only ones in which President Wilson on December 4, 1917, made any reference whatever to Russia. He made no reference whatever to the month-old Bolshevist government. Mr. POINDEXTER owes the President a retraction. He says he got the quotation out of a Bolshevist pamphlet. He ought to verify his quotations when he gets them from such a source.

That is the conclusion of the editorial. The subject of that editorial is a statement which I made and which appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 28, 1919, on page 331, in a colloquy with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], who had read from some remarks which I had made on an occasion of a public address outside of the Senate. It was that incident which called forth the statement which I made in reply to a direct question asked me by the Senator from Arkansas. I read:

Mr. POINDEXTER. What I referred to in the address that the Senator just mentioned were matters about which I presume there will be no dispute—certain matters of fact. The Senator from Arkansas undoubtedly has read the speech of the President delivered to Congress on January 8, 1918, in which the President referred to the Bolshevist government of Russia as represented at the Brest-Litovsk peace conference as "challenging the admiration of every friend of mankind," the language which was used by the President. The Senator undoubtedly is also familiar with the fact that the so-called Bolshevists or communists in the United States have taken that expression from the President's speech to Congress and printed it on the first page of the pamphlets which they have circulated throughout the world; and, I assume, as I said in Massachusetts, that eulogy of the Bolshevists by the President used in that way is of great benefit to the communist movement.

If this matter related only to the question of the accuracy of the single statement quoted in this editorial, important and vital as is the subject to which it refers, I would not call attention to it in this way. Even though it related only to the accuracy of the statement, being a quotation from the Chief Officer of the Government about a public matter of vital concern, I take it that it would not only have been an appropriate but a very desirable subject of public debate and public investigation and inquiry. But for the reason that it is only one of a series of acts and declarations indicating not merely sporadic expression of casual views but indicating a fixed and settled principle and a well-established policy on the part of the President in regard to this matter, I have considered it of sufficient importance to reprint in the RECORD the documents which I have read and make some comments upon them.

Mr. President, if I had misquoted the President in any respect whatever it would be a very great pleasure for me to offer him an apology, as is suggested by the editor of the New York Times; but, being prepared to show to the Senate that the statement which I made is literally correct and is a quotation from an authorized public document, there is no occasion for any apology either for inaccuracy of statement or for having referred to the subject at all.

I appreciate the interest of this great and very reputable newspaper in accuracy of statement. It is exceedingly important that those who are discussing great public questions should be accurate in their statements, though it is somewhat peculiar that a paper of this standing, in an editorial on the subject of accuracy of statement, which contains two main statements of fact, is absolutely not only inaccurate but wrong in every respect in each one of them. The editorial undertakes to dispute that the President had uttered the remarks which I quoted from him. It is wrong in that, as I shall show in a moment. It also contains the assertion that, referring to myself—

He says he got the quotation out of a Bolshevist pamphlet. He ought to verify his quotations when he gets them from such a source.

The newspaper is wrong in that statement. I made no such statement as to the source of my information. I did not make any statement as to the source of my information. I assumed that it would not be necessary. I assumed that the Senate, as I stated at the time, was familiar with the public utterances of the President of the United States delivered in official messages to the Congress.

It seems strange to me that a great newspaper like this, which is one of the thick-and-thin supporters of the President, is not familiar with the President's declarations and the President's views upon the great public questions of the day and that it does the President the injustice of denying that he took a certain attitude in regard to the government of Russia, known as the Bolshevist government, which, as a matter of fact, he did take. I think that the paper is entitled to a great deal of consideration, because it is perfectly natural that a friend of the President should resent an assertion that the President had made a public statement that the Bolshevist government of Russia, as represented at the Brest-Litovsk peace conference, was entitled to the admiration of every friend of mankind. I think there is naturally more or less repugnance on the part of the President's friends to such an assertion and that the paper ought to be regarded as entitled to a great deal of consideration for rushing to his defense; but certainly it is peculiar that it is not informed as to what the President's attitude was in regard to a subject to which it undertakes to state his position and to write a leading editorial.

Mr. President, I have in my hand an official publication entitled "Document No. 468, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session. Address of the President of the United States, delivered at a joint session of the two Houses of Congress, December 4, 1917." I also have "Document No. 765, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session. Address of President Wilson to the Congress of the United States, January 8, 1918."

The address of January 8, 1918, as will be seen by reference to the entire address, was on the subject of the new developments in Russia. It may enable those who are interested in this question, and also the New York Times, to give proper interpretation to the President's remarks by reference to the fact that the date of the overthrow of Kerensky was November 7, 1917; that the Brest-Litovsk peace conference met on December 20, 1917, and continued in session until March 4, 1918; that the treaty between the Bolshevist government of Russia and the German Imperial Government, known as the Brest-Litovsk treaty, was signed March 4, 1918; and that the constitutional assembly, which had been elected by the people of Russia, was dissolved by force of arms by the Bolshevik usurpers on January 20, 1918. So that it is quite significant, Mr. President, that at the very time mentioned by the Times, namely, a month later than December 4, 1917, the President declared his admiration of the Bolshevists. The New York Times editorial declares that on December 4, 1917—the Kerensky government had been overthrown, but the Bolshevist government was not effectively set up, the social democrats still having considerable voice in it. It was not until over a month later that they dispersed the constituent assembly by force and embarked on the wild career of absolutism.

I wish to call attention in connection with the comment of the editorial to the fact that it was just four days more than a month later than December 4, 1917, namely, January 8, 1918, that the President delivered the address to Congress which contained the language which I quoted from him, at a time which the editorial itself says would have given to that statement on the part of the President much greater significance than it would have had at an earlier date.

The President opened his address of January 8, 1918, by the statement—and I read this very largely to show the subject matter of the address, in order that the references further on made may be intelligently understood:

Once more, as repeatedly before, the spokesmen of the Central Empires have indicated their desire to discuss the objects of the war and the possible bases of a general peace. Parleys have been in progress at Brest-Litovsk between Russian representatives and the representatives of the Central Powers, to which the attention of all the belligerents has been invited for the purpose of ascertaining whether it may be possible to extend these parleys into a general conference with regard to terms of peace and settlement. The Russian representatives presented not only a perfectly definite statement of the principles upon which they would be willing to conclude peace but also an equally definite program of the concrete application of those principles.

Proceeding further in the statement the President says:

The Russian representatives—

Referring, of course, to the Russian representatives at the Brest-Litovsk peace conference—have insisted very justly, very wisely, and in the true spirit of modern democracy, that the conferences they have been holding with the Teutonic and Turkish statesmen should be held within open, not closed, doors, and all the world has been an audience, as was desired.

I will not interrupt the reading of this address of the President to the Congress further than to make the comment that if the same eulogy which the President delivered upon the Bolshevist representatives at the Brest-Litovsk peace conference in regard to the openness of their proceedings could have been delivered upon the peace conference of the Allies at Paris, of which the President was the chief representative of the United States, it would have been a great deal more gratifying to the people of the United States.

Reading further from the same address I quote the President as follows:

There is, moreover, a voice calling for these definitions of principle and of purpose which is, it seems to me, more thrilling and more compelling than any of the many moving voices with which the troubled air of the world is filled. It is the voice of the Russian people. They are prostrate and all but helpless, it would seem, before the grim power of Germany which has hitherto known no relenting and no pity. Their power, apparently, is shattered. And yet their soul is not subservient. They will not yield either in principle or in action. Their conception of what is right and what it is humane and honorable for them to accept, has been stated with a frankness, a largeness of view, a generosity of spirit, and a universal human sympathy which must challenge the admiration of every friend of mankind.

That is the identical language, Mr. President, which I quoted in the Senate and which the editorial I have read disputes. The statement of the President, which I repeat, to the effect that the representatives of the Bolshevist government of Russia at the Brest-Litovsk peace conference were entitled to the admiration of every friend of mankind, is not in my opinion the most significant feature of the President's address. The country is familiar with the tragic occurrences that plunged Russia into shame and impotency in course of the great German war. Everyone is familiar with the fact—it is borne in upon their consciousness if not familiar to their minds—that in the midst of this war, when the issues involved in the war were hanging in the balance, the communists of Russia, nay, not the communists only but the communists who believed in putting into effect the doctrines of communism by force—and, as I understand, that constituted Bolshevism—overthrew the patriotic government of Kerensky, which had been loyal to the Allies and which was endeavoring by every means in its power to carry on the war against Germany, to which the United States and its associates were committed, to the full extent of their man power and of their wealth, and after having overthrown the Kerensky government betrayed the Allies and made a base peace with Germany. By its terms many millions of Russian people were put under German dominion. By its treason to the Russian people and its shameless betrayal of their allies victory seemed placed in the reach of Germany. It may not have been known to blind men at that time what was obvious to those who could see, what was afterwards proved by the Sisson papers and by a thousand other proofs, that Lenin and Trotski were acting under the direction of the German general staff, but it was known that they had surrendered to that staff and withdrawn the support of the Russian Army from the Allies' cause. These were the traitors who were the objects of the President's eulogy. At the time of the President's address on January 8, 1918, the United States had been nine months in the war, the blood and treasure of our people had been pledged to its prosecution, and the liberty of our country depended upon its success.

It is no exaggeration to say that these Brest-Litovsk anarchists, whom the President recommends to the "admiration of every friend of mankind," by the most shameless betrayal in history, cost the lives of a vast army of Americans fighting for their country in France and the blood of hundreds of thousands of our Allies.

I say the country is familiar with those circumstances. The significant feature of the President's addresses of January 8, 1919, and of December 4, 1917, is that they show the astonishing fact that the President of the United States not only looked upon the representatives of the Bolshevist government with admiration but that he approved their terms of peace and was using his influence as the chief officer of this Government to bring about similar terms of peace between the United States and its associate powers and Germany.

I wish to read briefly from his address in order to show that fact, which is somewhat of an enlargement and development of the idea that was merely suggested in some of its milder forms in the quotation which I have already presented. It is quite familiar, Mr. President, that on January 22, 1917, a short time before the United States entered the war against Germany, the President made an address to the Senate of the United States after our subsequent associates had been carrying on the war for several years, when the issues were well defined and familiar to the world, in which he declared:

The statesmen of both of the groups of nations now arrayed against one another have said, in terms that could not be misinterpreted, that it was no part of the purpose they had in mind to crush their antagonists. But the implications of these assurances may not be equally clear at all—may not be the same on both sides of the water. I think it will be serviceable if I attempt to set forth what we understand them to be.

They imply, first of all, that it must be a peace without victory. It is not pleasant to say this. I beg that I may be permitted to put my own interpretation upon it and that it may be understood that no other interpretation was in my thought.

On December 4, 1917, many months after the United States had committed itself to this war, in an address to the Congress, the President referred to his speech of January 22, 1917, in which he declared that there should be a peace without victory, which was the same thing as saying that France and Great Britain should not win the war, in which he confirmed the views he had expressed at that time. This, I repeat, was eight months after we ourselves had entered the war and our people were exhausting our resources in order to gain a victory.

From every point of view, therefore, it has seemed to be my duty to speak these declarations of purpose—to add these specific interpretations to what I took the liberty of saying to the Senate in January—

This is on page 6 of the President's address of December 4, 1917—

That is the speech to which I have just referred—

Our entrance into the war has not altered our attitude toward the settlement that must come when it is over.

At this critical hour of the Nation's life he reiterated the base proposal of a craven "peace without victory," and on page 3 of his address adopts the very language of the traitors of Brest-Litovsk and recommends it to the American Congress.

It is this thought—

He says—

that has been expressed in the formula, "No annexations, no contributions, no punitive indemnities." Just because this crude formula expresses the instinctive judgment as to right of plain men everywhere it has been made diligent use of by the masters of German intrigue to lead the people of Russia astray, * * * in order that a premature peace may be brought about.

Mr. President, in regard to the statement that the Bolshevists had printed this declaration of the President upon the front page of pamphlets which they had circulated throughout the world, and which, as I stated, I assumed would be considered as an encouragement to the communistic movement, I have in my hand a pamphlet entitled, "A Voice Out of Russia," published by the Dial Publishing Co., of 152 West Thirteenth Street, New York, sold at the price of 10 cents, one of a number of pamphlets issued by that publishing company, some of which are listed on the cover as follows:

"Withdraw from Russia."

"Soviet Russia and the American Revolution," by Lincoln Colcord, the same man who is acting as a member of the press bureau of Mr. Plumb in promoting the so-called Plumb plan of railroad adjustment.

"A Voice Out of Russia," by George V. Lomonossoff.

"Decree on Land."

"Decree of Workers' Control."

It contains, covering almost the entire page, this extract from the President's address:

The treatment accorded Russia by her sister nations in the months to come will be the acid test of their good will, of their comprehension of her needs as distinguished from their own interests, and of their intelligent and unselfish sympathy.

There is, moreover, a voice calling for these definitions of principle and of purpose which is, it seems to me, more thrilling and more compelling than any of the many moving voices with which the troubled air of the world is filled. It is the voice of the Russian people. They are prostrate and all but helpless, it would seem, before the grim power of Germany, which has hitherto known no relenting and no pity. Their power, apparently, is shattered. And yet their soul is not subservient. They will not yield either in principle or in action. Their conception of what is right, and what it is humane and honorable for them to accept, has been stated wth a frankness, a largeness of view, a generosity of spirit, and a universal human sympathy which must challenge the admiration of every friend of mankind; and they have refused to compound their ideals or desert others that they themselves may be safe. (President Wilson in an address delivered at a joint session of the two Houses of Congress, Jan. 8, 1918.)

Mr. President, those declarations of the President, in his addresses to Congress, were not, as I said before, exceptional or casual, but were consistent parts of a fixed course. They were expressions of a settled principle and policy of Government by which the President's attitude toward the Bolshevists was determined. This, I think, will clearly appear by considering them in connection with the various incidents I will now call to your attention. I have in my hand the statement of the governor of California accompanying his action in commuting from death to life imprisonment the sentence of Thomas Mooney, convicted of dynamiting a preparedness-day parade. In this statement of the governor of California are incorporated several messages from the President of the United States to the governor, requesting his interference with the course of the decisions of the courts of California in the Mooney case in order to secure for Mooney a new trial. Strange as it may seem, it appears from these messages of the President to the governor of California in the Mooney case that the same influences that the President eulogized in his address to Congress which I have just read, and to which I referred here on a former occasion, were operating upon him to induce him, notwithstanding his position as Chief of the Federal Government, to use the influence of that position to interfere with the course of justice in a sovereign State of the Union.

Gov. Stephens says:

On July 22, 1916, 10 persons—men, women, and children—were killed and about 50 others wounded in a bomb explosion during a preparedness parade in the city of San Francisco.

The parade was a patriotic manifestation into which the people of the city had entered with much spirit and loyal impulse.

HOSTILITY TO UNITED STATES DEFENSE MEASURES ACTUATED CRIME.

Manifestly, because of the occasion chosen, hostility to the Nation's defense measures must have had a part in actuating the perpetration of so horrible a deed. It is not unreasonable to assume that a sympathy or even a definite relationship existed between these murderers and the propaganda and violence then being engaged in throughout the country by agents of the German Government.

The case as presented to the California courts was that of murder, without further evidence of motive than the impossible tenets of anarchists, whose sympathies for the German cause in the war are well known. Their wild pacifist theories fitted into the widespread activities of the Kaiser's agents in this country.

Omitting a part of his statement, and reading further, he said:

In considering the Mooney case, I have had before me the urgent appeal of the President of the United States that I grant commutation.

Originally, in January of this year, I received a letter from the President, asking me if it would not be possible to postpone the execution of Mooney until he could be tried upon one of the other indictments against him.

Inasmuch as an appeal already had been taken to the Supreme Court of California, which appeal itself acted as a stay of execution, there was at that time no occasion for action on my part. I take it that the President was not correctly informed as to the status of the case.

In March I received a telegram from the President urging that I commute Mooney's sentence. It was as follows:

This is the second message, the first not having been published:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, D. C., 12.06 p. m., March 27, 1918.

Gov. WILLIAM D. STEPHENS, Sacramento, Calif.

With very great respect I take the liberty of saying to you that if you could see your way to commute the sentence of Mooney, it would have a most heartfelt effect upon certain international affairs which his execution would greatly complicate.

(Signed) WOODROW WILSON.

Mark the language of that message:

Would have a most heartfelt effect upon certain international affairs.

It is well known, Mr. President, that the agitation for the commutation of the sentence of Mooney, so far as the impetus which attracted the attention of the country was concerned, originated not in the United States but at St. Petersburg, in the Bolshevist government of St. Petersburg; and it was that international influence which the President of the United States referred to in this telegram which I have just read, which he addressed to the governor of California.

The governor further says:

In June I received this additional message, the President again urging commutation of sentence:

"THE WHITE HOUSE,
"Washington, D. C., 3.51 p. m., June 4, 1918.

"Hon. WILLIAM D. STEPHENS:

"I beg that you will believe that I am moved only by a sense of public duty and of consciousness of the many and complicated interests involved when I again must respectfully suggest a commutation of the death sentence imposed upon Mooney."

Note again:

"I would not venture again to call your attention to this case did I not know the international significance which attaches to it.
(Signed) "WOODROW WILSON."

The governor says:

At the time of the receipt of these messages the case was still pending in the supreme court of the State. Not until August 23 was the case finally disposed of by the California courts, and on November 18 by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Further, the governor says in his statement:

REFUSES TO VIEW CASE AS CLASH OF CAPITAL AND LABOR.

I refuse to recognize this case as in any fashion representing a clash between capital and labor. I regard the petition of the defendant for clemency solely as that of a man convicted of murder in the first degree. On his behalf a propaganda has been carried on to make it appear that he is a martyr to the cause of labor. This is absurd. The methods pursued in this propaganda have partaken largely of the system described in the following letters written by Alexander Berkman, an associate of Mooney and an anarchistic agitator:

"I have had some experience in labor matters. I have also participated in the defense work of various labor cases in the East; and all my experience has convinced me that in such matters the thing of chief importance is to create favorable public sentiment. Funds, money for the defense, etc., are of secondary importance.

"Take, for instance, the case of Alexander Aldemas, the Spanish marine worker. He was arrested during the transport workers' strike of some three years ago, and he was charged with cutting a scab and shooting three policemen. The district attorney claimed he could give him 40 years.

"I was secretary of the Aldemas defense committee when Simon Pollock, one of our attorneys, came with an offer of compromise from the district attorney. Aldemas should plead guilty and get off with seven years State prison. * * * We had little money. Lawyer Darling, of Brooklyn, had squandered several thousand dollars of our hard-collected funds, but we gave him the sack and engaged Pollock. But we did not depend on money. We at once organized a wide campaign of publicity, held numerous mass meetings, agitated the matter in the press, and got in touch with the people all over the country for purposes of agitation. When Aldemas was first arrested everyone cried 'Hang him!' Within two months of intense agitation we so changed the public mind on the matter that Aldemas was sentenced to 1½ years instead of 40 years the district attorney had threatened us with, and instead of 7 years the lawyers were quite ready to accept for him. The moral is obvious: Stick to your guns always and under all circumstances, and, further, public agitation to change the psychology of the people is more important in such matters than big funds."

The defendant, Mooney, never has been identified with the labor movement that has achieved so much for the benefit of the workingmen and working women of California. His connections have been with a small group of agitators of pronounced anarchistic tendencies. However, the propaganda in his behalf, following the plan outlined by Berkman, has been so effective as to become world-wide.

I shall next read from an article published in the San Francisco Call, August 22, 1918, by John D. Barry, a communistic writer, referring to the propaganda and the agitation which had been instituted for the purpose of freeing Thomas Mooney, and which had resulted in the two telegrams from the President to Gov. Stephens, which I have already read, and in the first communication, which has not been given out, from the President to the governor, the President in the telegrams stating the fact that his interest in the matter was due to international agitation. It will show the identity of this influence on the Government of the United States with that which brought forth the declaration that the Bolshevists, Lenin and Trotski, as represented in the peace conference at Brest-Litovsk, were entitled to the admiration of every friend of mankind. Mr. Barry states in this article:

That demonstration in Petrograd was planned in this country. Some Russian workers who were going back from New York to Russia shortly after the outbreak of the revolution conceived the idea of rousing the whole world to what they believed to be the unjust treatment of Mooney. They knew that if they made the demonstration in the very heart of the revolution they would secure attention such as they could not possibly get here. When they explained the case to their comrades in Petrograd they found enthusiastic support. The news of the demonstration sent out by the press bureaus of Europe and the Associated Press of the United States made the case known everywhere.

In an article by the same writer, in the same paper, on another date, he said:

It is this point that caused the President to take so deep an interest in the case and to do everything he can to keep the principle from being violated. As Secretary Tumulty says, "He has gone the limit." Incidentally, as an executive with a practical mind, he appreciates the gravity at this time of a labor man being held up before the world of labor as one who is the victim of a conspiracy.

The significant thing, Mr. President, about that series of communications is that the President thereby disclosed his disposition to intervene in the jurisprudence of a State in a case of a most heinous character, involving the death penalty, not at all because of any question connected with the case nor because of any doubt as to the guilt of the defendant, but, as he himself states in his telegram, because of international complications—a willingness to mollify international Cerberuses by throwing to them the sop of our system of judicial procedure in a dual government of independent States operating under a Federal Union.

In the same connection, Mr. President, and to trace along the course of this influence and the tie that binds the various movements of the country and organizations of different names with the internationale of Russia and the socialists of Germany, many of them acting under the direction of the German autocracy, which used them for its purpose, I call attention to this report from the Washington Post of May 10, 1918, showing the connection between the I. W. W. movement in this country and this same Bolshevist junta in Petrograd, which were powerful enough to induce the President to interfere in the Mooney case and for which he expressed his admiration in the speech to Congress which I have read:

Chicago, May 9: Members of the Bolshevik party to interpret Bolshevism into I. W. W.ism, which is one manifestation of it in the United States.

CHICAGO, May 9.

Members of the Bolshevik Party in Russia were corresponding with the Industrial Workers of the World here in August, 1917, relative to activities in America, according to evidence submitted by the Government to-day in the trial of 112 I. W. W. leaders for seditious conspiracy.

Letters, antedating by only a few weeks the Russian revolution that placed the Bolsheviki in power, sought information from William D. Haywood and others as to the progress being made in the campaign to "take America from the capitalists and bring about industrial freedom."

Commenting on relations between the I. W. W. and the Russian party, one of the leading Russian members of the I. W. W. informed the membership on August 25, 1917, that "very soon we will have a Russian administration of the I. W. W."

DEFY COURTS AND GOVERNMENT.

Throughout the day the Government read into the records excerpts from propaganda used in the alleged antiwar campaign, pamphlets calling upon workers to destroy property for the purpose of wrecking industries, and song books containing bitter attacks on religious organizations and defying the courts and the Government.

"What is more civilized than for the workers to create powder that refuses to explode?" was one of the passages in the huge mass of documentary evidence seized by the Government in its nation-wide raid. "What is more civilized than to spike the guns when they are trained on our working-class brothers in other countries? Sabotage will civilize the soldier."

This form of propaganda, the Government alleges, was freely used shortly after enactment of the selective service law.

TEACHES SABOTAGE METHODS.

"Sabotage is the logical weapon of the revolutionist. It can be used in missending freight in times of stress, and likewise in all other industries. It is broad and changing as industry; it is as flexible as the imagination and passions of humanity. There is but one treason—loyalty to the employer." After outlining how sabotage can prevent movement of troops, munitions, and strike breakers by the "mere burning of drawbridges," one article declared "we will take over the land and the machinery thereof whether we are ethically justified or not," and continued:

"We will lose no time proving title to them beforehand; but we may, if necessary, hire a couple of lawyers and judges to fix up the deed and make the transfer legal. Indeed, if necessary, we will have a couple of learned bishops to sprinkle holy water on it and make it sacred."

On August 18, 1917, Haywood issued the following notice to members through Solidarity, the official organ:

"Murder by the capitalist gunmen can not stop, but only accelerate, the sweep of the revolution that soon will engulf the masters and their cowardly assassins. Let our motto be from now on: 'We never forget. Organize and avenge.'"

This notice was issued at a time when the Government charges the antiwar campaign was at its height.

I next refer to an article in the Washington Star of June 4, 1919, as indicating the character of this movement, which has exerted such a powerful influence upon our Government, in connection with the recent bomb explosions, one of which occurred at the house of the Attorney General of the United States here in this city, similar ones occurring about the same time in some six or seven other places in the United States, each one having for its object a selected victim of the communists, as indicating the source of that enterprise and its connection with the same influences that I have been speaking of:

BOSTON, June 4.

The circulars entitled "Plain words" found scattered about the houses wrecked by dynamiters Monday night were printed in this city, according to an announcement to-day by the police, who asserted that they had the printing plant under surveillance. All the printing for the propaganda of local anarchists is believed to be issued from this plant.

Evidence that anarchists responsible for bomb explosions at the homes of Judge W. H. S. Thompson, of the United States district court, and W. W. Sibray, chief inspector of the bureau of immigration, Monday night, were operating under orders from Russian radicals' headquarters at 133 East Fifteenth Street, New York, was in the hands of the police here to-day.

There is considerable additional information, one item of which is a telegram dated June 4 from New York:

NEW YORK, June 4.

New York police have no evidence to support the theory of Pittsburgh detectives that the anarchists responsible for yesterday's bomb explosions acted under orders from the Russian radical headquarters at 133 East Fifteenth Street, this city, according to a statement made at police headquarters to-day.

It was said that the house in question, which is known as the "Russian People's Home," has been under constant surveillance since last March, when it was raided and 164 persons were arrested.

That was March, 1918.

Four of these were subsequently deported. Since that time, the police say, they have had no evidence that the house was being used as the headquarters of the terrorists.

The "Russian People's Home" at that time was the headquarters of the terrorists in the United States, and according to the information which I have, to which I have undertaken to give a judicial consideration, it is that same influence which has reached so far as to interfere with the processes of the courts in California. The same strange penchant for settling "international complications" by concessions of essential rights and principles, as in the internationalization of the Panama Canal and the interruption of judicial procedure in California led also to interference with the processes of the administration of criminal law in the State of Utah, in the case of Hillstrom, "generally known as Joe Hill, the hobo poet." He was "an active member of the I. W. W. and the author of the hobo marching song, Hallelujah, I'm a Bum."

Gov. Spry, of Utah, on November 18, 1915, gave out this statement in regard to Hillstrom, who was under sentence of death, upon conviction of murder:

Reviewing the history of the case, and particularly the President's action in connection with it, the governor says, in his telegram:

"September 30 you requested a stay of execution of the sentence to give the Swedish minister an opportunity to present his view of the case. Upon the same day, at your request only, on the assumption that you were in possession of facts not presented to the board, I granted a respite until October 16, especially requesting that the Swedish minister personally investigate the case and appear before the board. Under date of October 1 you advised me that your only reason for interceding was the request of the representative of a foreign government.

Foreign Government again, although this time apparently not, in fairness I may say, the Government of Russia, but the Government perhaps of Sweden on this occasion was the reason for the attempt to put a brake upon the procedure of the courts of Utah for the administration of its laws. As to the influence cooperating with the Swedish Government it is stated:

Ever since his arrest it has been alleged by his I. W. W. brethren and by many socialists that Hillstrom was being made a victim of class prejudice because of his revolutionary activities, and they have carried on an energetic campaign in his behalf, enlisting the aid of President Wilson, the Swedish minister—Hillstrom being a Swedish subject—and many other prominent persons. This week the American Federation of Labor, in convention in San Francisco, asked for clemency for Hillstrom.

The governor says:

October 16, at the regular board meeting, an open hearing was had in further consideration of the case. Hillstrom's attorney advised the board that there was nothing further to present and that Hillstrom declined to appear before the board again.

The only representation in the convict's behalf was a short telegram from the Swedish minister, requesting commutation of sentence, not by reason of any new thing in relation to the case, but, as he expressed it, "for the sake of humanity and comity usually practiced between friendly nations." Because of the absence of any showing the board terminated the respite and again denied the commutation. The convict thereupon was on the 18th day of October resentenced by the court to be shot November 19.

Forty-six days after the granting of the respite and at the eleventh hour, you, as the President, without stating any reasons therefor, again wired, urging a thorough reconsideration of the case because of its importance and the justice and advisability of such a course.

Your interference in the case may have elevated it to an undue importance, and the receipt of thousands of threatening letters demanding the release of Hillstrom, regardless of his guilt or innocence, may attach a peculiar importance to it, but the case is important in Utah only as establishing, after a fair and impartial trial, the guilt of one of the perpetrators of one of the most atrocious murders ever committed in this State. It is also important by reason of the fact that this case has had more careful and painstaking consideration at the hands of the proper officials of Utah than any other like case in the history of the State.

That is the case which, at the instance of a foreign Government and of the socialist friends of Hillstrom, the President of the United States undertook with the influence of his office to control. There is the statement of the governor of Utah that the President had no facts to present, and that he offered no reason, no excuse or justification whatever for his effort to set aside and pervert the administration of the laws of Utah except that he had been requested to do so by a foreign Government.

The President's telegram to the governor of Utah in that case is as follows:

With unaffected hesitation, but with a very earnest conviction of the importance of the case, I again—

This is his second telegram—venture to urge upon your excellency the justice and advisability, if it be possible, of a thorough reconsideration of the case of Joseph Hillstrom.

WOODROW WILSON.

Mr. President, passing from the Mooney case and the Hillstrom case, which are, I think, clearly shown to be but incidents in the general course of Bolshevist activities and I. W. W. propaganda in this country, I want to call attention to another case in which there were similar interferences with the course of justice by the President, apparently, or at least by some one in high authority. I am not prepared to say in this case that it was the President, but I will submit the documents for what they are worth.

In the San Francisco Chronicle of July 12, 1919, there is an article with this headline and reading as follows:

ROBT. MINOR CASE BIGGEST SCANDAL OF WAR, OFFICIALS OF ARMY DECLARE—LANSING AND COL. HOUSE INVOLVED, REPORT—FRENCH CENSOR STOPS STORY.

PARIS, July 11.

While Secretary Lansing was talking about the truth and international reparations before a South American and Franco-American audience in Paris on Tuesday night, the French censor forbade publication here of a strictly American story about Robert J. Minor being released by Gen. Pershing on reported orders by President Wilson.

Secretary Lansing and Col. House are involved in what Army officials privately declare, will be the greatest scandal of the war when the American public hears the evidence. An Army official says Minor was prepared for a printed campaign to make the American Army of Occupation Bolshevik. It is known in Coblenz that the printer who produced the pamphlets containing Minor's secrets of Bolshevism had been located by the American Expeditionary Forces and was prepared to testify to Minor's connection with the unsettling propaganda had the case gone to trial.

CONGRESSMAN DEPOSITED COIN.

Minor was seen in Paris Tuesday evening. It is known $250 was transmitted to him through official channels, the money having been deposited in Washington by an American Congressman. It is also known that Acting Secretary of State Polk transmitted from Washington to Paris a report on Minor's previous radical activities, which is said to be anything but complimentary to Minor.

Ambassador Wallace, interviewed to-day, said:

"The American embassy's official knowledge of the Minor affair is confined to Col. House's request for information shortly after Minor's arrest in Paris about June 1 by the French police and his deportation to Coblenz. When information on the arrest was obtained it was given to Col. House, and our embassy's interest ceased since the American Expeditionary Forces then became custodian of Minor's person."

BRITISH WOULD QUIZ MINOR.

It is recognized Ambassador Wallace's and Gen. Pershing's positions in the matter have been extremely delicate and embarrassing, and that Army officials released Minor only on the reported direction of President Wilson. British authorities are deeply interested in getting possession of Minor. They desire to interrogate him regarding Bolshevik propaganda in the British Army.

Another article from a different source——

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I prefer not to do so if the Senator will postpone his question just a moment.

Mr. KING. It is with respect to the Minor matter.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator insists upon it, I shall of course answer his question.

Mr. KING. I shall not insist upon it, of course, if it displeases the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I read a dispatch from Coblenz dated July 8:

Minor release laid to orders of "higher ups."

I am presenting these documents, Mr. President, for what they are worth, and I call attention to the fact that they come from a great many different sources and have a great wealth of detail and substantiality. This is an article under the name of Edwin L. James, who, I assume, is a well-known newspaper correspondent from the prominence that is given his name.

UNUSUAL CASE OF FORMER S. F. NEWSPAPER MAN STIRS INTEREST IN PARIS—COL. HOUSE ACTIVE—SUSPECTED PROPAGANDIST IS MYSTERIOUSLY FREED AFTER ARMY COURT NAMED.

[By Edwin L. James, Special Correspondent The Chronicle.]

COBLENZ, July 8.

Robert J. Minor, held for four weeks in the military prison at Coblenz awaiting trial on charges of violation of the articles of war, has been released.

Orders for his release appear to have emanated from a source superior to military authority. He was freed after the military commission had been named to try him, after the charges had been prepared and served upon him, after witnesses had been brought from many places, and after great effort and expense by the Army in the preparation of the case. His release is regarded as unusual.

In no other case in the legal annals of the American Expeditionary Forces has such interest been shown by persons in civil authority not connected with the Military Establishment. In no other case has the embassy at Paris called upon Army headquarters every day for information.

ARRESTED IN PARIS.

Minor was arrested in Paris June 8, after attending a meeting of the Paris strike leaders. In his hotel was found a trunk full of propaganda, supposed to have been for distribution among American soldiers in Germany.

The first notice of high interest in the case came with a request from Col. House for information. Soon after money came for Minor through the American embassy in Paris, a thing natural enough. Thereafter the embassy gave orders that it be kept informed of all developments, and nearly every day the embassy called Coblenz on the telephone for information. Meanwhile the British military authority at Cologne tried 10 persons there for radical efforts among the troops, including an attempt on Gen. Plumer's life. Minor's name was mentioned at this trial a number of times.

MIXED WITH RADICALS.

Following his trial in Germany, it was shown he had associated with radicals there. Saturday there came orders from Gen. Pershing to release Minor. He was put in a train and sent to Paris. Not until late last night did the military authorities make public the fact that he had gone, and then only after it had leaked out through a subordinate officer.

The authorities here refuse to give out the evidence against Minor or to allow correspondents to see the alleged Bolshevik propaganda, or the charges. Minor is a former New York and San Francisco newspaper man, once a cartoonist on the New York World. He is a graduate of Princeton and the son of an American judge.

I am informed upon authority which I believe to be creditable that Robert Minor was the head of the Mooney Defense League.

Among the effects of one of the Hindoo conspirators tried and convicted in San Francisco were letters introducing Comrade Robert Minor to Trotski, in Russia, and asking Trotski to assist in the revolution in India; there were also letters of introduction to a celebrated revolutionary woman in Sweden.

It was rumored that Minor was first indicted for sedition in the United States courts in New York—that part I only state upon information—and then given passports to Russia; his associate, Selig Schulberg, was refused passports to Russia about that time. Schulberg intended to take the Mooney prosecution film, called "The Frame Up," to Russia.

Robert Minor is supposed to have written the scenario for this film.

Lieut. Leonard and Sergt. Green, of the Army intelligence office in San Francisco, were in close touch with Minor's activities. It is rumored that the Army intelligence office was called off the scent from high authority in Washington.

So much for that incident, Mr. President.

In following the course of these activities, which in order to be understood, obviously, should be taken as a whole, in order to determine whether or not there is a settled belief, policy, or principle involved, and to show the effect upon the country, I wish to call attention to a dispatch from Jackson, Minn., dated July 9, as follows:

BAER'S VIEWS LIKE WILSON'S, HE SAYS—NORTH DAKOTA CONGRESSMAN DEFENDS NONPARTISAN LEAGUE AT TRIAL.

JACKSON, MINN., July 9.

Representative J. M. BAER, of Fargo, N. Dak., testifying to-day at the conspiracy trial of A. C. Townley and Joseph Gilbert regarding his statement of principles in the Nonpartisan League's war-program pamphlet issued in 1917, declared the sentiments contained in this pamphlet have since shown that "myself and the league were five months ahead of President Wilson's 14 points."

BAER declared the attack on war corporations contained in the pamphlet was made before the Government passed the excess-profits law. He defended the criticism of "imperialistic designs" contained in the pamphlet by asserting that his criticism has been supported "by the treaty recently drawn up at Versailles, where Japan and other nations have gained vast territory which we must protect."

After Representative BAER read his war declarations and explained them on direct examination, he was cross-examined by Prosecuting Attorney Nicholas.

Nicholas, taking the utterances almost sentence by sentence, demanded that the North Dakota Congressman explain how the utterances should be construed as assisting the Government in the war. BAER insisted again and again that he followed the attitude of President Wilson in drawing a distinction between the peoples and the rulers of various governments.

Mr. BORAH. Does Mr. BAER state what the 14 points are now?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; they have since been lost.

Another incident, Mr. President: I stated in this address, which was challenged by the New York Times, that I supposed that the printing of the President's eulogy of the Bolshevists upon the back of their pamphlet in circulation throughout the world would be an encouragement to communists. I leave it to impartial judges as to whether or not it would be, and I want to cite a little proof to bear out the statement which I made.

Here is a report of a fact about which I assume there can be no question. In the Post-Intelligencer of Seattle, Wash., Wednesday, May 28, 1917, the headline of the article is:

Philosophy of I. W. W. is from President's book—Bruce defense contends The New Freedom is source of radical views.

The article is as follows:

That the I. W. W. drew its philosophy from the teachings of President Wilson, and regarded his book, The New Freedom, as a singularly powerful exposition of the organization's view of existing relations between capital and labor, was the amazing contention of the defense Tuesday in the trial of James Bruce, now facing a charge of criminal anarchy in the superior court.

Following a lengthy verbal skirmish, during which the jury was excused, between George F. Vanderveer, counsel for Bruce, and Deputy Prosecutor Charles E. Claypool, Judge Walter M. French overruled the State's objection to the reading of excerpts from Mr. Wilson's book. And in the course of his cross-examination of a witness for the State, Elbert Coutts, a former I. W. W. agitator, Vanderveer read several passages which the witness said embodied to a great extent the I. W. W. philosophy.

Certain statements in the book presented by the attorney, Coutts said, did not agree with arguments he had heard in I. W. W. halls, but the general tenor of the passages, he asserted, after hearing them all, was in harmony with radical theories.

WILSON'S BOOK IS QUOTED.

Some of the most striking paragraphs from the book read by Mr. Vanderveer—

In the defense of a man charged, according to this article, with criminal anarchy—follow.

Now, quoting from the New Freedom:

"Don't you know that there are mills in which men are made to work seven days in the week for 12 hours a day, and in the 365 weary days in the year can't make enough to pay their bills? And this in one of the giants among our industries, one of the undertakings which have thriven to gigantic size upon the very system. * * *

"We have come to be one of the worst-ruled, one of the most completely controlled and dominated governments in the civilized world—no longer a government by free opinion, no longer a government by conviction and the vote of the majority, but a government by the opinion and the duress of small groups of dominant men. * * *

"Don't you see that big business has already captured the Government?

"The Government of the United States is the foster child of special interests."

Attorney Vanderveer than pointed out in a copy of the Industrial Worker, an I. W. W. publication, an advertisement offering The New Freedom as a prize to subscription solicitors. "The I. W. W. has borrowed and adopted President Wilson's philosophy," he said in addressing the court.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, I might suggest to him that it is an axiom that the devil can quote scripture; so that no doubt the I. W. W. might quote a very excellent book in support of their pernicious doctrines.

Mr. POINDEXTER. But you can not find any doctrine like that in the Bible.

As to the spread of this propaganda and this philosophy as quoted in this instance in the defense in a criminal case and exemplified in so many directions, I note a remarkable incident, which, taken in connection with the other circumstances arising from day to day, seems to me to be probably a part and parcel of this new, synchronized, and harmonized movement on the part of the I. W. W., the Russian Bolshevists, and their sympathizers and encouragers:

BANQUET GIVEN TO MEN CONVICTED OF SEDITION.

SEATTLE, WASH., June 14.

Councilman W. D. Lane, acting mayor during Mayor Ole Hanson's recent absence in the East—

Hanson was touring the East to receive congratulations for having put down the Bolshevist revolution in Seattle, and while he was gone the acting mayor of the town, W. D. Lane—and 300 men and women prominent in labor circles attended a banquet last night in honor—

One might think it was in honor of some very distinguished person who had rendered some great service for the State; but it was in honor—of Hulet M. Wells and Sam Sadler on the eve of their departure for the Federal penitentiary, to serve a two-year sentence for sedition. The banner of the electrical workers was hung over the face of a large American flag used as a decoration. Red carnations were used as table decorations and worn by many of the banqueters.

Wells was a former president of the Central Labor Council.

As showing another incident in the publicity program, indicating the danger, the effect, and the use which is made of the encouragement given by the high officials of the Government to movements of this kind, here [exhibiting] is a photograph of a billboard in San Francisco. Clear across the top of it, in large letters, are the words "President Wilson," followed by this statement:

Has asked for a new trial for Thomas J. Mooney. Mass meeting, Civic Auditorium, Tuesday evening, April 16. To secure justice in this case stand by the President.

This is a photograph of the billboard. The description of the billboard, with this language on it, as stated by my correspondent, is as follows:

I inclose herewith photograph of one of the numerous billboards in this city bearing a poster of an unusual character. It explains itself. Without warrant, the President is utilized to give added force to an appeal emanating from an anarchistic source—an appeal that is of an incendiary nature and that is calculated to inflame public opinion, the effect of which can not be other than prejudicial to law and order.

* * * * * * *

Another odd combination that has aroused much comment in the city is the fact that the head of the police commission is the attorney for the interned German diplomatic attachés here, members of the abolished German consulate. In other words, on one hand, as a public official supposed to be in quest of pro-German plots and plotters, fully possessed of Government secret business pertaining thereto; on the other hand, professionally engaged in the direct service of the Kaiser's duly accredited representatives and working to advance their interests and assist them in the cause they represent. Such a thing would probably be impossible in any other country than America. Jekyll and Hyde was an amateur.

Passing on, Mr. President, very briefly to the counterpart of this movement in foreign countries. In Egypt they had a perfectly futile and helpless insurrection. Men, women, and children marched down the streets of Cairo crying, "Hurrah for Dr. Wilson," their emotions being based upon speeches which they had read from the President promising self-determination to the peoples of the world. The result of it, of course, was a lot of funeral processions, and nothing more. That is the wide gulf between promise and performance, between beautiful theories and putting those theories into effect, between raising the aspirations of peoples, inciting them to futile efforts, and coming to their assistance, in doing something for them when they have been aroused.

I have an article here from a very brilliant writer, although I think he is a kind of Bolshevist himself. He was arrested in Egypt, and was there while these things were taking place. I refer to William T. Ellis. He writes in sympathy with this revolution and describes some of the circumstances of it.

CAIRO, May 30.

Pharoah's present peril is that he may be drafted into the army of Lenin, Trotski and Company.

It is astonishing how these matters are connected up with Lenin and Trotski. They seem to be the centers around which gather those encouraged to revolution by the President's speeches.

Pharoah's banner is already red, plus three little moons and stars, and "blood on the moon" would quickly incarnadine his banner.

This man, like a great many other radicals, is a very fine writer, a fine phrase maker, but always getting himself and other people into trouble.

Further in his article he says:

Uncomprehendingly, they have been stirred by the tides of the times. The war has shaken them from their ancient stolidity and contentment. Without knowing what they mean, they repeat the big new watchwords to which President Wilson has given currency. A variety of grievances, real and fancied, some of the smallest of which seem greatest in their eyes, have aroused them against the British. Volatile as children, they are also quite as gullible. With the immediacy of simplicity, they think that all things desirable may be granted overnight. They expect the millennium in the morning.

They are not peculiar in that respect. There are some in this country who expect the millennium in the morning, and that it can be brought about by a wave of the hand, and that we can escape the labor and the difficulty and the time that has been required to accomplish the blessings of the world; that by some sudden change in government, some new proclamation, we can establish a new order, in which all men will be comfortable and happy and free from the evils of the world. It seems that that was the idea that these people had gotten.

He goes on to say:

Then came some announcement which turned all eyes toward the two Americans perched up in the gallery, and quickly there followed, in perfect unison and with great vehemence, the familiar "Yahia el America!" "Yahia Dr. Wilson!"—"Long live America!" "Long live Dr. Wilson!" After which the preacher proceeded, with arms upstretched to us, to make an address wherein he drew a parallel between what Washington was to young America and what Wilson is to the new Old World. The way in which Asia cites American history never ceases to be a marvel to me.

* * * * * * *

After sitting throughout that address and a short one by a native Protestant Christian we left, and it took the active efforts of several functionaries to keep the crowd from rushing us and carrying us on their shoulders. Even so, as we left the mosque the rabble at the gate shouted, "Yahia el America!" What will they cry when they learn that Paris—which to them means President Wilson—has not acceded to all their demands?

* * * * * * *

Meanwhile the phase of the matter that is gravest is the effect upon the whole Near East. The issue is now far greater than any question of British administration in Egypt. It touches the stability of civilization. If once the masses of the Orient are caught up in the Bolshevik conflagration then the world will be in the direst trouble it has ever known. From this central point the fire will sweep in every direction and with even less restraint than has been shown in Russia. All the structure of western civilization that has been built up like a framework around the East will collapse, and there may be nothing left for the western nations to do but to shut themselves within their own borders until the holocaust has exhausted itself. So many dire possibilities are conjured up by the prospect of Bolshevism raging outward from Egypt that one prefers not to dwell upon them.

Those are some of the prospects that are created in the world by these declarations to which the revolutionists of Egypt are looking to set them free of the British rule and bring to them, as this writer says, a new millennium. And what was the result?

CAIRO, May 17.

Egypt's insurrection is not Bolshevism—though it may easily become the entrance of Bolshevism into the Orient—but it borrowed one of Bolshevism's big ideas, the public funeral as a demonstration. This device of making the dead speak the message of the moment has reached its climax in the land that has ben more famous for its mummies than for its men. America has no analogy for it.

That was the result of arousing the desires and aspirations of the Egyptian people, without prospect, possibility, or intention of rendering them any practical assistance.

Mr. President, I have been told that the Korean people—a simple and excellent people, gullible, I suppose, as this writer describes the Egyptians—believed a story that was circulated among them that President Wilson, who was their shibboleth as he was to the Egyptians, was going to appear in Korea in an airplane some day and set them free from Japan. They started a futile, helpless insurrection. We have heard here in eloquent speeches of the mutilations of their children, the abuses of their women, the murder of their men by the Japanese soldiers. That is all that came of it; and what was the incentive? What was the instigation? There has been considerable discussion of that. I present here for your consideration in that connection a statement from Tokyo, dated June 5:

TOKYO, June 5.

Reports that American missionaries incited the Korean insurrection are quite incorrect according to a statement of K. Yoshizawa, counselor of the Japanese foreign office, who has returned after an investigation of the situation in Korea.

Speaking to Japanese newspaper men Mr. Yoshizawa expressed the view that the disturbances were the outcome of a collision between the old-fashioned thought of the Tendokyo cult and the modern thought produced by the influence of Christianity. Mr. Yoshizawa continued: "A lack of perfect understanding between Japanese and Koreans is one of the main causes of the disturbance, but the principal cause that led to the uprising is the discontent and complaint in the mind of the Koreans, which suddenly burst out, prompted by the new-born thought kindled by the principle of self-determination."

And so it has reached even to Korea, if this authority is to be believed. The extent to which this movement has spread in the United States, Mr. President, is shown by this special article in the Evening Star, of this city, of June 8, 1919, from which I read this paragraph:

Contained in the mass of material are assertions of the infiltration of I. W. W. members, agents, and even officials into important branches of the Government or of governmental activities. Among the documents are seemingly adequate proofs of the planting of such agents of revolution in legations and embassies of foreign governments in Washington. Detailed statements appear in the material of employment of active members of the I. W. W. in important positions in at least one department of the Government. Positive assertions are made of payment of specified sums of money by known, avowed anarchists to at least one member of a Government board assigned to investigations of industrial difficulties. Direct charges contained in the mass of material of suppression of reports of anarchistic and I. W. W. activities and propaganda indicate that the subtle poison has infected half a dozen or more of the working parts of the governmental machine.

Here is a circular put out by the Department of Labor, issued through the United States Employment Service:

For extra copies address Roger W. Babson, Chief, Information and Education Service, Department of Labor, 1706 G Street NW., Washington, D. C. W. B. Wilson, Secretary of Labor.

The United States Department of Labor is signatory to it. This is a dodger in large letters, quite significant now in the face of the demand for the nationalization and socialization, not only of the railways but—as I read in the statement of their chief representative before the House committee—of all industry.

Changing from war to peace we must cooperate as American freemen now or later drudge as somebody's slaves.

Does that sound like a Government publication? It sounds to me more like an I. W. W. document. I place it here, along with this photograph of Mooney's billboards, for examination by anybody who chooses to examine them, and ask that they be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Changing from war to peace, we must cooperate as American freemen now or later drudge as somebody's slaves.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF LABOR.
W. B. WILSON, Secretary of Labor.

(For extra copies address Roger W. Babson, Chief Information and Education Service, Department of Labor, 1706 G Street NW., Washington, D. C.)

President Wilson has asked for a new trial for Thomas J. Mooney. Mass meeting, Civic Auditorium, Tuesday evening, April 16, 8 p. m., to secure justice in this case. Stand by the President. Speakers, Maxwell McNutt, Mrs. Hannah Sheehy-Skeffington, William Spooner, Rena J. Mooney, Israel Weinberg, Edward D. Nolan; chairman, John P. Beckmeyer, Machinists' Union, Lodge No. 68. Auspices of Machinists' Union, Lodge No. 68; indorsed by San Francisco Labor Council and affiliated unions.

Mr. POINDEXTER. They say they are for revolution; that the railroads, as the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] quoted, will be tied up so tight that they will never run again if we do not pass the laws that they want to have passed. That is in line with the I. W. W. They are for revolution.

Here is a dispatch from the Associated Press:

NEW YORK, July 17.

James T. Holland, president of the New York State Federation of Labor, testifying to-day before the joint legislative committee investigating radical and seditious activities in the State, declared that the I. W. W. had organized many thousands of workers throughout the country on a platform which included in its planks one calling for the destruction of the American Government.

I have shown, Mr. President, the union between the I. W. W. of America and the Bolsheviki of Russia. The one can be interpreted by the other and the acts of the one understood in the light of the accomplishments of the other.

Continuing to read:

The most powerful of the radical organizations, Mr. Holland asserted, was the Amalgamated Garment Workers of America, with a membership which he estimated at 70,000.

As an evidence of the wide, sweeping plans of the I. W. W. letters were read into the testimony before Mr. Holland took the stand in which I. W. W. leaders urged European and South American workers to join in a scheme for an "international revolutionary industrial union."

Those words sound very familiar—"union," "international," "internationalism," "international union for a common principle." It runs through the German autocracy. Though they do not propose that this international union should be under the control of a German autocracy, so far as the union of the world is concerned under one central government, the Prussian military autocracy, the Bolsheviki of Russia, the International Workers of the World of the United States, many pacifists and so-called intellectuals of this country, and the League to Enforce Peace, proposing a constitution of government for the world, have a common belief in the union of the world, and a centralized government with power to enforce its decrees upon all mankind.

Proceeding, this Associated Press dispatch says:

WOULD ORGANIZE MARINE WORKERS.

One of the most ambitious projects was the organization of the marine workers of the two Americas and the maritime European countries into "one big union."

The most fruitful field found by the radicals in this country, according to Mr. Holland, has been the garment industry, the second greatest industry in the United States. Asked what were the principles of the organization formed by the International Workers of the World among the garment workers, Mr. Holland replied:

"They don't believe in government. They preach that behind closed doors now and none of them preach it out of doors."

KNOWS THEY FAVOR SOVIET.

The witness was then asked if it ever had been brought to his attention that the Amalgamated Garment Workers favored a soviet form of government.

"It has not only been brought to my attention, but it has been rammed down my throat," replied Mr. Holland. "But the majority of the working men and working women are Americans first and not soviets, as some would have us believe."

Mr. Holland admitted that the radicals had succeeded in winning about 25,000 recruits from the conservatives in New York State in the last three years. Outside of the garment workers he mentioned the molders and the hotel and restaurant employees as two of the trades in which radical propaganda had been successful.

The whole International Workers of the World movement is controlled by foreigners, according to the New York labor leader. He asserted that 85 per cent of the radicals in this State—are not American citizens, and that the Amalgamated Garment Workers' Union is controlled by foreigners also.

That is, New York—

The Woman's Trade Union League also was attacked by the witness as "a tail to the socialistic kite," and he charged that this organization had expressed sympathy for the soviet government at a convention in Philadelphia on June 9.

Before Mr. Holland took the stand several documents were read into the record, including letters addressed by officials of the International Workers of the World to Russian, Finnish, Spanish, Portuguese, Italian, and other foreign workers, setting forth the plan to organize an "international revolutionary industrial union" as the best means for overcoming the capitalists.

In the Evening Star, of this city, of June 16, 1919, there is a dispatch from Schenectady, N. Y., dated June 12, as follows:

SCHENECTADY, N. Y., June 12.

There are probably between 300,000 and 500,000 men and women living in New York City who believe in and advocate the unlawful and forcible seizure of property and the revolutionary overthrow of the established Government. This estimate was given by State Senator C. R. Lusk, chairman of the joint legislative committee investigating seditious activities in this State, in an address before the State conference of mayors and other city officials.

"A few years ago," Senator Lusk said, "these doctrines were systematically advocated by a few so-called 'crack pots.' To-day in the city of New York this propaganda is being systematically handled by shrewd, experienced men and women who seem to be systematically coordinating their efforts and who apparently have no lack of funds with which to operate. In New York City alone over 50 publications are regularly circulated advocating this radical doctrine.

VIOLENCE OPENLY ADVOCATED.

"A large number of public meetings are held each week in the city in which these doctrines are openly advocated. When the speakers at these meetings suggest accomplishing these results by force and violence the suggestion is received with tremendous applause. It is estimated by people in a position to know that as many as 100 meetings of this kind have been held in the city in one week. Speakers are being sent throughout the State and have been holding meetings even in the smallest cities, and they are circulating their literature among the workingmen throughout the entire State."

Senator Lusk suggested as an immediate and temporary remedy an appeal to public sentiment and reason by means of public meetings and the press. "The time has come," he said, "to make it perfectly plain that this is not a political question; it is not a question upon which men and women with knowledge of the facts can honestly differ."

NEED FOR POLICE WORK.

Senator Lusk also suggested that police officers of unquestioned patriotism and ability should be assigned to this work and instructed to see to it that the holding of meetings and the distribution of seditious literature are stopped. He also called to the attention of the city officials the new State law which provides that the governing boards of cities may establish industrial aid bureaus. This law provides an instrument, he said, whereby city officials can be in touch with the unemployed and discontented in the community and show them that the State is able and willing to take care of its people in its industrial depression.

Regarding a permanent remedy, Senator Lusk said that practically the only remedy suggested so far is a class of legislation which, when analyzed, amounts to little more than a wage-raising program. "Something constructive," he said, "must be done to do away with profiteering and to do away with capital's making excessive and unreasonable profits on the necessities and luxuries of life before the real permanent remedy for this industrial unrest will be reached."

I want to call attention to a brief statement showing that these Bolshevists, whose terms of peace were approved by the President, whose conduct at Brest-Litovsk was eulogized by him, and who were so highly esteemed by the President, in pursuance of his address to the Senate of January 22, 1917, reiterated and confirmed on December 4, 1917, some months after we had entered into the war, were traitors to the Allies and in the employ of the German Government. I want to read an extract from an article over the signature of Edgar Sisson, published in the Evening Star, of this city, on a recent date:

All the world, except America, seems to appreciate the fall of the German-Bolshevik poison plan—how its efforts for anarchy in all Entente and friendly neutral countries, as well as in Hungary and Austria, were intensified immediately after the armistice, and how the sinister assault continues. The threat of casting the world into Bolshevistic chaos was all the weapon that Germany had left after its military defeat, and it has wielded it unceasingly to lessen its own punishment.

Yet in America to tell the truth about Bolshevism is to become a target for innuendo and abuse. It is the apologists for Bolshevism who receive consideration and protection.

That statement is entitled to credence, because the author of it was in Russia for a considerable time, and his work has been subjected to investigation by impartial experts in this country, who found that the documents which he presented showing documentary proof of the employment of the Lenin and Trotski government by the German Government were genuine.

In that same connection, Mr. President, I ask leave to print an Associated Press dispatch from Zurich, Switzerland, showing the activities of the Germans in propagating I. W. W., Bolshevist, and radical doctrines throughout the world.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

ZURICH, SWITZERLAND, June 4.

The further the trial here of 28 alleged pro-German agents proceeds the more evidence is produced tending to show that German secret diplomacy has been at work throughout the whole world.

Two of the prisoners—Hindus—are charged with plotting revolutions in Switzerland and Italy, planning to murder former Premier Salandra and Foreign Minister Sonnino, of Italy, and to blow up banks in Rome, in Milan, and to destroy the famous Simplon and other tunnels.

PAWNS OF VON BUELOW.

The examination of the accused men thus far has indicated that they were only pawns in the hands of Prince von Buelow, once German chancellor, and Baron von Stockhammer, who from Lucerne directed the movements of the revolutionists and riots in America, Europe, India, Egypt, and North Africa, the German Government supplying unlimited funds.

The Hindu anarchist, Lala Har Dayal, who was brought to Berlin by the Germans, was sent to Zurich and then to Constantinople in order to foment a holy war among the Mussulmans, using the German Embassy at Constantinople as his office, according to testimony adduced to-day.

It was further testified that all the money for use by the conspirators was sent from Berlin to Berne in the German diplomatic pouch. From some of the testimony it would appear that German activity has not yet ended.

BOMBS AND BACTERIA SHOWN.

The tables in the courtroom were to-day loaded with a mass of bombs, grenades, and revolvers of German origin, and there were poison and bacteria tubes placed in evidence.

In the house of the German consul general here it is alleged there were found 500 grenades, 100 revolvers, and thousands of cartridges. One Hindu is declared to have acted as financial agent and to have brought large sums of money to Zurich. The trial, which is being carried on in the Italian language, is expected to last a week.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I want also to read the eighth paragraph of article 1 of the constitution of the Russian Socialist Federated Soviet Republic.

8. In its effort to create a league—free and voluntary, and for that reason all the more complete and secure—of the working classes of all the peoples of Russia, the third Congress of Soviets merely establishes the fundamental principles of the federation of Russian Soviet Republics, leaving to the workers and peasants of every people to decide the following question at their plenary sessions of their soviets: Whether or not they desire to participate, and on what basis, in the federal government and other federal soviet institutions.

I call attention to the general similarity of the style of that instrument to that of the covenant of the league of nations and the distinguishing characteristics which mark it and separate it from such an instrument as the Constitution of the United States, which latter in brief and concise language lays down the law, while these documents express the aspirations of their friends, their hopes, their wishes, their desires, instead of declarations of supreme law.

I present also, Mr. President, a card mailed at Cleveland, Ohio, with this language:

The grand synthesis of world events is now electing Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States of America, to be the first president of the United States of the World.

A constitution for the government of the United States of the World will be sent free on application from the Cleveland School of the University of the World, instituted to propagate the philosophy of Americanism, by C. A. Bowsher, Caxton Building, Cleveland, Ohio.

Also, Mr. President, I have in my hand, but do not ask to have it printed, simply submitting it for examination of anybody who cares to examine it, one of a daily series of cartoons printed upon the front page of a great daily newspaper, indicating this idea of internationalism that is permeating the world under the propaganda of the league of nations, a picture of a soldier returned from the Great War with Germany holding the arm of a veteran of the Civil War, a member of the Grand Army of the Republic, and the point of the cartoon is that the member of the Grand Army of the Republic proudly wears upon his coat the insignia of his order, the Grand Army of the Republic, while the soldier of the United States who has just returned from service in the Army of the United States in the war with Germany wears upon his coat the insignia "Grand army"—not of the Republic nor of the United States, but "Grand army of the world." There is considerable food for thought in that cartoon as indicating the extent to which the idea of merging the United States with the affairs of all the world has found public expression.

That same idea of international union was called to my attention in a picture, which I will not ask to be printed, but which I submit for examination, the cover picture of a magazine printed at Toronto, Canada, called National Progress, an illustrated journal of Canadian growth. The feature of it to which I wish to call attention is a new coat of arms of a union government that is printed upon the back of that paper, in which, under the motto, "In unity is strength," are printed the flags of Great Britain and of the United States entwined and the insignia of the United States, Great Britain, and Canada. It is in line with many of the advertisements which are printed by Americans and circulated at great expense for a United States of the World, in which Canada, Great Britain, and the United States shall merge their identity into mere states in a greater union.

Mr. President, in this work, the New Freedom, in which Bruce in defending his case in Seattle found refuge, I find on page 46 this comment upon the Constitution of the United States:

> The makers of our Federal Constitution read Montesquieu with true scientific enthusiasm. They were scientists in their way—the best way of their age—those fathers of the Nation. Jefferson wrote of "the laws of nature," and then by way of afterthought, "and of nature's God." And they constructed a government as they would have constructed an orrery—to display the laws of nature. Politics in their thought was a variety of mechanics. The Constitution—

Referring to the Constitution of the United States—> was founded on the law of gravitation. The Government was to exist and move by virtue of the efficacy of "checks and balances."

>
> The trouble with the theory is that government is not a machine, but a living thing. It falls, not under the theory of the universe but under the theory of organic life. It is accountable to Darwin, not to Newton.
> It is modified by its environment, necessitated by its tasks, shaped to its functions by the sheer pressure of life. No living thing can have its organs offset against each other, as checks, and live.

In other words, the Constitution of the United States, being a constitution of checks and balances, according to the author of "The New Freedom," can not live.

Having so disposed of the Constitution of the United States, one would think that the President would have more regard for the earlier and more revolutionary instrument—the Declaration of Independence—but I was very much surprised, in turning to his remarks in this glossary of political ideals, to find that he entertains no greater regard for the Declaration of Independence than he does for the Constitution of the United States. On page 48 of this work he says:

> Some citizens of this country have never got beyond the Declaration of Independence—

He speaks quite contemptuously of them—

> signed in Philadelphia, July 4, 1776. Their bosoms swell against George III, but they have no consciousness of the war for freedom that is going on to-day.

He seems to think that the Declaration of Independence is quite obsolete and has lost its efficacy in these modern times.

Having spoken so lightly of Thomas Jefferson, it might be expected that the President would turn with admiration to Jefferson's great antithesis in the ideas and conflicts of ideas in the framing of the Government—Alexander Hamilton—and so I turned to see what he had to say about Alexander Hamilton. But much to my surprise he seems to have no more regard, or less even, for Alexander Hamilton's views of government than he had for those of Thomas Jefferson. On page 55 the President said:

> There are two theories of government that have been contending with each other ever since government began. One of them is the theory which in America is associated with the name of a very great man, Alexander Hamilton. A great man, but, in my judgment, not a great American. He did not think in terms of American life.

On pages 58 and 59 may be found this statement, and this is what apparently has encouraged these men to commit the acts for which they were sent to the penitentiary and which they set up in the trial—a rather mistaken interpretation, no doubt; I hope so, at least:

> The Government of the United States at present is a foster child of the special interests. It is not allowed to have a will of its own. * * * The Government of the United States in recent years has not been administered by the common people of the United States. You know just as well as I do—it is not an indictment against anybody, it is a mere statement of the facts—that the people have stood outside and looked on at their own Government and that all they have had to determine in past years has been which crowd they would look on at; whether they would look on at this little group or that little group who had managed to get the control of affairs in its hands.

These extracts on pages 60 and 61 might be very well considered in connection with the proposition to set up a government of the league of nations to be directed by a council of men chosen in ways which are not provided, a league of nations under the direction of a council, which is to set itself up as the guardian of the world, under the supposition that this council which is to direct the league of nations are going to know better what the world needs and what will be for the best interests of the world than anybody or everybody else will know under Lincoln's idea of "government by the people." Here is what President Wilson said in former days about government by a council:

> I have never found a man who knew how to take care of me, and, reasoning from that point out, I conjecture that there isn't any man who knows how to take care of all the people of the United States. I suspect that the people of the United States understand their own interests better than any group of men in the confines of the country understand them.

When we read about the settlement of the affairs of the world upon the recommendation of experts in Paris, experts in this line or the other, men generally without broad knowledge, with acute understanding of a particular line but perfectly helpless outside of that, undertaking to frame a constitution and the terms of peace upon which the entire world is to conduct the hard, practical problems of life for the future, it is pertinent to read what President Wilson says about experts, on page 60:

> I don't want a smug lot of experts to sit down behind closed doors in Washington and play Providence to me.

He might have said Paris, too. If he had had that in view at that time no doubt he would—

> There is a Providence to which I am perfectly willing to submit. But as for other men setting up as providence over myself, I seriously object. I have never met a political savior in the flesh, and I never expect to meet one.

On page 64, he said:

> I do not believe that there is a group of men of any kind to whom we can afford to give that kind of trusteeship.
> I will not live under trustees if I can help it. No group of men less than the majority has a right to tell me how I have got to live in America. I will submit to the majority, because I have been trained to do it, though I may sometimes have my private opinion even of the majority. I do not care how wise, how patriotic, the trustees may be. I have never heard of any group of men in whose hands I am willing to lodge the liberties of America in trust.

Having entirely discredited the leading statesmen of the early days of the Republic one would think Mr. Wilson would turn with admiration to the leaders of parties of modern times in the United States. But in his universal condemnation of declarations of independence and constitutions of the United States and government by trustees, of Thomas Jefferson and Alexander Hamilton, he has this comment to make upon two great modern leaders of America, on page 68:

> My thought about both Mr. Taft and Mr. Roosevelt is that of entire respect, but these gentlemen have been so intimately associated with the powers that have been determining the policy of this Government for almost a generation that they can not look at the affairs of the country with a view of a new age and of a changed set of circumstances.

The President has taken an oath of office to "preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States."

The Constitution vests in Congress exclusive control of the foreign trade of the United States.

The President has entered into a compact with foreign powers whereby the supervision of the trade of the United States in munitions of war shall be vested in a league of nations.

The Constitution vests in Congress exclusive and complete control over duties on imports into the United States. The President, in pursuance of his declaration in favor of "the removal, so far as possible, of all economic barriers" between the nations associating themselves together for the maintenance of peace, has signed an agreement with foreign nations whereby the United States binds itself to "make provision to secure and maintain freedom of transit * * * for the commerce of all member States."

The Constitution vests in Congress unlimited power "to raise and support armies," and "to provide and maintain a navy." The President has negotiated a covenant with foreign nations whereby when the status of the Army and Navy has been fixed by the proceedings therein set out the same can not be increased without the permission of the league of nations, and the President has agreed to terms whereby the league of nations may coerce the United States in case of its refusal to abide by this agreement, whereby the sovereign power to raise and maintain armies and navies shall be surrendered to a league of nations in violation of the Constitution.

The Constitution vests in the various branches of the Government the sovereign power to "provide for the common defense" by every means necessary and proper to that end within the functions of government as defined in the Constitution.

The President has negotiated and signed a constitution of union with other powers whereby every international dispute between the United States and a foreign country is transferred from the jurisdiction of the Government of the United States to that of a league of nations, and the President has agreed upon terms whereby the league of nations can enforce its decrees against the Government and people of the United States.

The "Monroe doctrine" is the unwritten law of the foreign policy of the United States. The administration of this doctrine has resulted in the rule of international law, as governing the United States, that this Government will not consent to the control of an independent American nationality by a European power. The President has agreed that in any international dispute between an American and a European power the league of nations, including Europe and Asia, shall have power to render and enforce its judgment.

The Constitution of the United States declares its purpose to be "to promote the general welfare" of the people of the United States. The President has endeavored and is now endeavoring to obligate the United States, contrary to its own interests, to protect "the territorial integrity and political independence" of every member of the proposed league of nations, in whatever part of the world it may be situated, regardless of the merits of the contest in which it may be involved, and regardless of the interests or general welfare of the United States.

The Constitution vests the conduct of the foreign affairs of the United States, subject to such laws as may be enacted by Congress and to the constitutional powers of the Senate, in the President. In the exercise of this power the President has violated the traditional policy of the Nation of honest friendship with those nations with which we are at peace by entering into a compact with Japan for the transfer of a substantial part of China and of her people from her own jurisdiction and authority to that of Japan, over the protests of our ally China, and agreeing, on the part of the United States by article 10 of the league of nations, to assist Japan in retaining this Chinese territory; and this violation of the "territorial integrity" of China was included by the President in the same compact in which he agreed to "preserve the territorial integrity" of the members of the league.

For a long period of time the President has absented himself from the seat of government, and for a period of six months, with one brief interval, has neglected the duties of his office, being absent from the Capital and beyond the seas.

He has endeavored to place limitations and restrictions on the power vested in Congress by the Constitution to raise armies, to provide and maintain a Navy, to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces, to declare war, to regulate commerce with foreign nations, to define and punish piracies on the high seas.

He has proposed and is now attempting to secure an arrangement by which, under article 16 of the proposed league, the United States shall be in a state of war with foreign countries without a declaration of war by the Congress or assent thereto by the people of the United States.

He has agreed with the representatives of foreign countries, in article 15 of the proposed league, that every dispute of the United States "likely to lead to a rupture," however vital to the interests of the United States, shall be placed under the control of a foreign tribunal, in which, in such cases, the United States will have no vote.

He has attempted to set up a government separate and apart from the Government of the United States, with distinct and foreign powers of its own, and has agreed, in article 16 of its constitution, that the United States shall be subject to its coercion should the United States declare war contrary to its decrees.

He has neglected the duty and interests of the United States in Mexico, and, after the expenditure of the lives and treasure of our people in expeditions into Mexico, has uselessly abandoned these campaigns and withdrawn therefrom without purpose or result.

He has attempted to impose on the United States the joint duty with other nations of "preserving as against external aggression" the territorial integrity and existing political independence of Great Britain, India, South Africa, Australia, Canada, Hedjaz, Portugal, Italy, Japan, and many other nations, thus embroiling us in the quarrels of most of the world. He has declared in favor of a union of the world and the joining of our fortunes with the fortunes of other nations.

He has advocated, as President of the United States, that we should cease to seek the national advantage of the United States, and that we should make a "supreme national sacrifice," though we have committed no international sin for which this sacrifice is to atone.

He has abandoned the teachings of Washington, the established principle of our foreign policy, against participation in the ordinary politics of Europe, and has attempted to make the United States a party to all European and Asiatic international controversies.

While President, he has undertaken to act in the distinct and separate capacity of envoy extraordinary to a peace congress in a foreign country, thus attempting to be the appointer and the appointee of the same office, and by associating himself in the capacity of delegate with other delegates to the congress, appointed by himself, has destroyed the power of independent action or decision of these delegates.

He has used the influence of Federal Chief Executive to trespass upon the independent jurisdiction of the States of California and Utah, by attempting to interfere with the course of justice in those States.

He has, as President, attempted to control the decision of bitter foreign controversies in which the United States has but a remote concern. He has officially undertaken the settlement of local territorial and racial quarrels as in the case of Fiume, Thrace, and Shantung, and in so doing has unnecessarily antagonized and affronted our Allies in the war.

By general phrases of vague meaning, such as "the democratization of industry" without definition or application, he has aroused aspirations throughout the world which he is incapable of satisfying, tending to set the world in chaos.

Quoting from his propaganda, the communists demand, under threat of revolution, that the railroads be given, at public expense, into the possession and management of the operatives and employees.

It is as though the President has received the world as a toy and proceded to take it apart in order to reconstruct it on a new plan. Now, with its pieces scattered around him, he finds that he has no new way and that he can not put it together again in the old way. He has declared the end of the old order, and substitutes for it the new disorder.

Mr. MYERS. I ask that the pending resolution, Senate resolution 157, go over until to-morrow without prejudice. In explanation of my request that the resolution go over until to-morrow I will say that I am ready for a vote on it now, and would be glad to have a vote, but several Senators who are absent and can not be here this afternoon desire to speak on it, and I promised them in their absence and on their account that I would ask to have the resolution go over until to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ROBERT MINOR.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, when the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] was speaking he referred to Mr. Robert Minor, the correspondent who was arrested, as the information indicated, for the dissemination of seditious literature amongst the troops. The information the Senator has given to the Senate was similar to that which I had received from various sources; indeed, a number of persons who had been in Europe communicated with me and averred that he had been engaged in the spread of Bolshevik literature amongst the soldiers. I was also advised that he had been arrested and subsequently had been discharged.

Acting upon the information which I received, I believed it was due the country to learn what the facts were, and accordingly, a few days ago, I introduced in the Senate a resolution calling upon the War Department to furnish full and complete information in regard to that matter. If there have been any improper influences employed by the War Department or the State Department or any executive branch of the Government to protect Minor or any other man who advocates Bolshevism, I think those influences ought to be understood. I hope that the War Department will transmit a full and complete report of the facts in regard to the Minor transaction. If it does not furnish adequate information within a reasonable time, I shall call the attention of the Senate to that fact and shall offer another resolution asking the State Department to furnish information. I think that the situation is of such a character as to demand a full and complete explanation from some source as to the reasons why he was so summarily released from custody.

HIGH COST OF LIVING.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that after the morning hour on Wednesday next I shall address the Senate on the subject of cold storage in connection with the high cost of living.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, August 12, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, August 12, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we come to Thee this morning with our prayers. We remember especially the boys who are now gathered in the very shadow of the Capitol, who will march in their glorious comradeship the last time, perhaps, over our historic Avenue, who will be reviewed with pride by our whole people, the boys who first stood the shock of battle, the boys who turned the tide in favor of justice and right and truth. We bless Thee that they have returned. We thank Thee that so large a number of them have come back in their strength and health. As they leave their comradeship of arms to go back into the paths of peace, into the work of the world, may they carry with them unsoiled that character that has been forged in the furnace of this great world conflict. Give to them ever-increasing prosperity and success. Help all nations with thankful hearts to praise God that the war is over, that the victory is won. May the glory be given to Thy name. For Christ's sake. Amen.

On request of Mr. LODGE, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

ISSUANCE OF RAILROAD PASSES (S. DOC. NO. 57, PT. 2).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Director General of Railroads, transmitting, in further response to a resolution of the 8th ultimo, certain information relative to the number of annual passes issued during the period of Federal control good over all lines under the United States Railroad Administration, etc., which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed.

RECESS UNTIL 2 O'CLOCK.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, when I gave notice that I would ask permission of the Senate to address it to-day upon the league of nations I was not aware, of course, that there was to be a parade of the marines. I am sure it is the desire of Senators generally to see the parade and to pay honor in that way to some of the best and bravest troops in the world, the survivors and associates of the men who charged at Chateau-Thierry and went through Belleau Wood. I am therefore going to move that we take a recess until 2 o'clock, and at 2 o'clock I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate to be allowed to proceed with the address of which I gave notice.

I make the motion that the Senate take a recess until 2 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until 2 o'clock p. m., at which hour it reassembled.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, in the Essays of Elia, one of the most delightful is that entitled "Popular Fallacies." There is one very popular fallacy, however, which Lamb did not include in his list and that is the common saying that history repeats itself. Universal negatives are always dangerous, but if there is anything which is fairly certain, it is that history never exactly repeats itself. Popular fallacies, nevertheless, generally have some basis, and this saying springs from the undoubted truth that mankind from generation to generation is constantly repeating itself. We have an excellent illustration of this fact in the proposed experiment now before us, of making arrangements to secure the permanent peace of the world. To assure the peace of the world by a combination of the nations is no new idea. Leaving out the leagues of antiquity and of mediaeval times and going back no further than the treaty of Utrecht, at the beginning of the eighteenth century, we find that at that period a project of a treaty to establish perpetual peace was brought forward in 1713 by the Abbé de Saint-Pierre. The treaty of Utrecht was to be the basis of an international system. A European league or Christian republic was to be set up, under which the members were to renounce the right of making war against each other and submit their disputes for arbitration to a central tribunal of the allies, the decisions of which were to be enforced by a common armament. I need not point out the resemblance between this theory and that which underlies the present league of nations. It was widely discussed during the eighteenth century, receiving much support in public opinion; and Voltaire said that the nations of Europe, united by ties of religion, institutions, and culture, were really but a single family. The idea remained in an academic condition until 1791, when under the pressure of the French Revolution Count Kaunitz sent out a circular letter in the name of Leopold, of Austria, urging that it was the duty of all the powers to make common cause for the purpose of "preserving public peace, tranquillity of States, the inviolability of possession, and the faith of treaties," which has a very familiar sound. Napoleon had a scheme of his own for consolidating the great European peoples and establishing a central assembly, but the Napoleonic idea differed from that of the eighteenth century, as one would expect. A single great personality dominated and hovered over all. In 1804 the Emperor Alexander took up the question, and urged a general treaty for the formation of a European confederation. "Why could one not submit to it," the Emporer asked, "the positive rights of nations, assure the privilege of neutrality, insert the obligation of never beginning war until all the resources which the mediation of a third party could offer have been exhausted, until the grievances have by this means been brought to light, and an effort to remove them has been made? On principles such as these one could proceed to a general pacification, and give birth to a league of which the stipulations would form, so to speak, a new code of the law of nations, while those who should try to infringe it would risk bringing upon themselves the forces of the new union."

The Emperor, moved by more immediately alluring visions, put aside this scheme at the treaty of Tilsit and then decided that peace could best be restored to the world by having two all-powerful emperors, one of the east and one of the west. After the Moscow campaign, however, he returned to his early dream. Under the influence of the Baroness von Krudener he became a devotee of a certain mystic pietism which for some time guided his public acts, and I think it may be fairly said that his liberal and popular ideas of that period, however vague and uncertain, were sufficiently genuine. Based upon the treaties of alliance against France, those of Chaumont and of Vienna, was the final treaty of Paris, of November 20, 1815. In the preamble the signatories, who were Great Britain, Austria, Russia, and Prussia, stated that it is the purpose of the ensuing treaty and their desire "to employ all their means to prevent the general tranquillity—the object of the wishes of mankind and the constant end of their efforts—from being again disturbed; desirous, moreover, to draw closer the ties which unite them for the common interests of their people, have resolved to give to the principles solemnly laid down in the treaties of Chaumont of March 1, 1814, and of Vienna of March 25, 1815, the application the most analogous to the present state of affairs, and to fix beforehand by a solemn treaty the principles which they propose to follow, in order to guarantee Europe from dangers by which she may still be menaced."

Then follow five articles which are devoted to an agreement to hold France in control and check, based largely on other more detailed agreements. But in article 6 it is said:

> To facilitate and to secure the execution of the present treaty, and to consolidate the connections which at the present moment so closely unite the four sovereigns for the happiness of the world, the high contracting parties have agreed to renew their meeting at fixed periods, either under the immediate auspices of the sovereigns themselves, or by their respective ministers, for the purpose of consulting upon their common interests, and for the consideration of the measures which at each of those periods shall be considered the most salutary for the repose and prosperity of nations and for the maintenance of the peace of Europe.

Certainly nothing could be more ingenuous or more praiseworthy than the purposes of the alliance then formed, and yet it was this very combination of powers which was destined to grow into what has been known, and we might add cursed, throughout history as the Holy Alliance.

As early as 1818 it had become apparent that upon this innocent statement might be built an alliance which was to be used to suppress the rights of nationalities and every attempt of any oppressed people to secure their freedom. Lord Castlereagh was a Tory of the Tories, but at that time, only three years after the treaty of Paris when the representatives of the alliance met at Aix-la-Chapelle he began to suspect that this new European system was wholly inconsistent with the liberties to which Englishmen of all types were devoted. At the succeeding meetings, at Troppau and Laibach, his suspicion was confirmed and England began to draw away from her partners. He had indeed determined to break with the alliance before the Congress of Verona, but his death threw the question into the hands of George Canning, who stands forth as the man who separated Great Britain from the combination of the continental powers. The attitude of England, which was defined in a memorandum where it was said that nothing could be more injurious to the idea of government generally than the belief that their force was collectively to be prostituted to the support of an established power without any consideration of the extent to which it was to be abused, led to a compromise in 1818 in which it was declared that it was the intention of the five powers, France being invited to adhere, "to maintain the intimate union, strengthened by the ties of Christian brotherhood, contracted by the sovereigns; to pronounce the object of this union to be the preservation of peace on the basis of respect for treaties." Admirable and gentle words these, setting forth purposes which all men must approve.

In 1820 the British Government stated that they were prepared to fulfill all treaty obligations, but that if it was desired "to extend the alliance so as to include all objects, present and future, foreseen and unforeseen, it would change its character to such an extent and carry us so far that we should see in it an additional motive for adhering to our course at the risk of seeing the alliance move away from us, without our having quitted it." The Czar Alexander abandoned his Liberal theories and threw himself into the arms of Metternich, as mean a tyrant as history can show, whose sinister designs probably caused as much misery and oppression in the years which followed as have ever been evolved by one man of second-rate abilities. The three powers, Russia, Austria, and Prussia, then put out a famous protocol in which it was said that the "States which have undergone a change of government due to revolution, the results of which threaten other States, ipso facto cease to be members of the European alliance, and remain excluded from it until their situation gives guaranties for legal order and stability. If, owing to such alterations, immediate danger threatens other States, the powers bind themselves, by peaceful means, or if need be by arms, to bring back the guilty State into the bosom of the great alliance." To this point had the innocent and laudable declarations of the treaty of Paris already developed. In 1822 England broke away and Canning made no secret of his pleasure at the breach. In a letter to the British minister at St. Petersburg he said:

> So things are getting back to a wholesome state again. Every nation for itself, and God for us all. The time for Areopagus, and the like of that, is gone by.

He also said, in the same year, 1823: "What is the influence we have had in the counsels of the alliance, and which Prince Metternich exhorts us to be so careful not to throw away? We protested at Laibach; we remonstrated at Verona. Our protest was treated as waste paper; our remonstrances mingled with the air. Our influence, if it is to be maintained abroad, must be secure in the source of strength at home; and the sources of that strength are in the sympathy between the people and the Government; in the union of the public sentiment with the public counsels; in the reciprocal confidence and cooperation of the House of Commons and the Crown." These words of Canning are as applicable and as weighty now as when they were uttered and as worthy of consideration.

The Holy Alliance, thus developed by the three continental powers and accepted by France under the Bourbons, proceeded to restore the inquisition in Spain, to establish the Neapolitan Bourbons, who for 40 years were to subject the people of southern Italy to one of the most detestable tyrannies ever known, and proposed further to interfere against the colonies in South America which had revolted from Spain and to have their case submitted to a congress of the powers. It was then that Canning made his famous statement, "We have called a new world into existence to redress the balance of the old." It was at this point also that the United States intervened. The famous message of Monroe, sent to Congress on December 2, 1823, put an end to any danger of European influence in the American Continents. A distinguished English historian, Mr. William Alison Phillips, says:

> The attitude of the United States effectually prevented the attempt to extend the dictatorship of the alliance beyond the bounds of Europe, in itself a great service to mankind.

In 1825 Great Britain recognized the South American Republics. So far as the New World was concerned the Holy Alliance had failed. It was deprived of the support of France by the revolution of 1830, but it continued to exist under the guidance of Metternich and its last exploit was in 1849, when the Emperor Nicholas sent a Russian army into Hungary to crush out the struggle of Kossuth for freedom and independence.

I have taken the trouble to trace in the merest outline the development of the Holy Alliance, so hostile and dangerous to human freedom, because I think it carries with it a lesson for us at the present moment, showing as it does what may come from general propositions and declarations of purposes in which all the world agrees. Turn to the preamble of the covenant of the league of nations now before us, which states the object of the league. It is formed "in order to promote international cooperation and to achieve international peace and security by the acceptance of obligations not to resort to war, by the prescription of open, just, and honorable relations between nations, by the firm establishment of the understandings of international laws as the actual rule of conduct among governments, and by the maintenance of justice and a scrupulous respect for all treaty obligations in the dealings of organized peoples with one another."

No one would contest the loftiness or the benevolence of these purposes. Brave words, indeed! They do not differ essentially from the preamble of the treaty of Paris, from which sprang the Holy Alliance. But the covenant of this league contains a provision which I do not find in the treaty of Paris, and which is as follows:

> The assembly may deal at its meetings with any matter within the sphere of action of the league or affecting the peace of the world.

There is no such sweeping or far-reaching provision as that in the treaty of Paris, and yet able men developed from that treaty the Holy Alliance, which England, and later France, were forced to abandon and which, for 35 years, was an unmitigated curse to the world. England broke from the Holy Alliance and the breach began three years after it was formed, because English statesmen saw that it was intended to turn the alliance—and this league is an alliance—into a means of repressing internal revolutions or insurrections. There was nothing in the treaty of Paris which warranted such action, but in this covenant of the league of nations the authority is clearly given in the third paragraph of article 3, where it is said:

> The assembly may deal at its meetings with any matter within the sphere of action of the league or affecting the peace of the world.

No revolutionary movement, no internal conflict, of any magnitude can fail to affect the peace of the world. The French Revolution, which was wholly internal at the beginning, affected the peace of the world to such an extent that it brought on a world war which lasted some 25 years. Can anyone say that our Civil War did not affect the peace of the world? At this very moment, who would deny that the condition of Russia, with internal conflicts raging in all parts of that great Empire, does not affect the peace of the world and therefore come properly within the jurisdiction of the league? "Any matter affecting the peace of the world" is a very broad statement which could be made to justify almost any interference on the part of the league with the internal affairs of other countries. That this fair and obvious interpretation is the one given to it abroad is made perfectly apparent in the direct and vigorous statement of M. Clemenceau in his letter to Mr. Paderewski, in which he takes the ground in behalf of the Jews and other nationalities in Poland that they should be protected, and where he says that the associated powers would feel themselves bound to secure guaranties in Poland "of certain essential rights which will afford to the inhabitants the necessary protection, whatever changes may take place in the internal constitution of the Polish Republic," he contemplates and defends interference with the internal affairs of Poland—among other things—in behalf of a complete religious freedom, a purpose with which we all deeply sympathize. These promises of the French prime minister are embodied in effective clauses in the treaties with Germany and with Poland and deal with the internal affairs of nations, and their execution is intrusted to the "principal allied and associated powers;" that is, to the United States, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan. This is a practical demonstration of what can be done under article 3 and under article 11 of the league covenant, and the authority which permits interference in behalf of religious freedom—an admirable object—is easily extended to the repression of internal disturbances, which may well prove a less admirable purpose. If Europe desires such an alliance or league with a power of this kind, so be it. I have no objection, provided they do not interfere with the American Continents or force us against our will but bound by a moral obligation into all the quarrels of Europe. If England, abandoning the policy of Canning, desires to be a member of a league which has such powers as this, I have not a word to say. But I object in the strongest possible way to having the United States agree, directly or indirectly, to be controlled by a league which may at any time, and perfectly lawfully and in accordance with the terms of the covenant, be drawn in to deal with internal conflicts in other countries, no matter what those conflicts may be. We should never permit the United States to be involved in any internal conflict in another country, except by the will of her people expressed through the Congress which represents them.

With regard to wars of external aggression on a member of the league, the case is perfectly clear. There can be no genuine dispute whatever about the meaning of the first clause of article 10. In the first place, it differs from every other obligation in being individual and placed upon each nation without the intervention of the league. Each nation for itself promises to respect and preserve as against external aggression the boundaries and the political independence of every member of the league. Of the right of the United States to give such a guaranty I have never had the slightest doubt, and the elaborate arguments which have been made here and the learning which has been displayed about our treaty with Granada, now Colombia, and with Panama, were not necessary for me, because, I repeat, there can be no doubt of our right to give a guaranty to another nation that we will protect its boundaries and independence. The point I wish to make is that the pledge is an individual pledge. We have, for example, given guaranties to Panama and for obvious and sufficient reasons. The application of that guaranty would not be in the slightest degree affected by ten or twenty other nations giving the same pledge, if Panama, when in danger, appealed to us to fulfill our obligation. We should be bound to do so without the slightest reference to the other guarantors. In article 10 the United States is bound on the appeal of any member of the league not only to respect but to preserve its independence and its boundaries, and that pledge, if we give it, must be fulfilled.

There is to me no distinction whatever in a treaty between what some persons are pleased to call legal and moral obligations. A treaty rests and must rest, except where it is imposed under duress and securities and hostages are taken for its fulfillment, upon moral obligations. No doubt a great power impossible of coercion can cast aside a moral obligation if it sees fit and escape from the performance of the duty which it promises. The pathway of dishonor is always open. I for one, however, can not conceive of voting for a clause of which I disapprove because I know it can be escaped in that way. Whatever the United States agrees to, by that agreement she must abide. Nothing could so surely destroy all prospects of the world's peace as to have any powerful nation refuse to carry out an obligation, direct or indirect, because it rests only on moral grounds. Whatever we promise we must carry out to the full, "without mental reservation or purpose of evasion." To me any other attitude is inconceivable. Without the most absolute and minute good faith in carrying out a treaty to which we have agreed, without ever resorting to doubtful interpretations or to the plea that it is only a moral obligation, treaties are worthless. The greatest foundation of peace is the scrupulous observance of every promise, express or implied, of every pledge, whether it can be described as legal or moral. No vote should be given to any clause in any treaty or to any treaty except in this spirit and with this understanding.

I return, then, to the first clause of article 10. It is, I repeat, an individual obligation. It requires no action on the part of the league, except that in the second sentence the authorities of the league are to have the power to advise as to the means to be employed in order to fulfill the purpose of the first sentence. But that is a detail of execution, and I consider that we are morally and in honor bound to accept and act upon that advice. The broad fact remains that if any member of the league suffering from external aggression should appeal directly to the United States for support the United States would be bound to give that support in its own capacity and without reference to the action of other powers, because the United States itself is bound, and I hope the day will never come when the United States will not carry out its promises. If that day should come, and the United States or any other great country should refuse, no matter how specious the reasons, to fulfill both in letter and spirit every obligation in this covenant, the United States would be dishonored and the league would crumble into dust, leaving behind it a legacy of wars. If China should rise up and attack Japan in an effort to undo the great wrong of the cession of the control of Shantung to that power, we should be bound under the terms of article 10 to sustain Japan against China, and a guaranty of that sort is never invoked except when the question has passed beyond the stage of negotiation and has become a question for the application of force. I do not like the prospect. It shall not come into existence by any vote of mine.

Article 11 carries this danger still further, for it says:

> Any war or threat of war, whether immediately affecting any of the members of the league or not, is hereby declared a matter of concern to the whole league and the league shall take any action that shall be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace of nations.

"Any war or threat of war" means both external aggression and internal disturbance, as I have already pointed out in dealing with article 3. "Any action" covers military action, because it covers action of any sort or kind. Let me take an example, not an imaginary case, but one which may have been overlooked, because most people have not the slightest idea where or what a King of the Hejaz is. The following dispatch appeared recently in the newspapers:

HEJAZ AGAINST BEDOUINS.

> The forces of Emir Abdullah recently suffered a grave defeat, the Wahabis attacking and capturing Kurma, east of Mecca. Ibn Savond is believed to be working in harmony with the Wahabis. A squadron of the royal air force was ordered recently to go to the assistance of King Hussein.

Hussein I take to be the Sultan of Hejaz. He is being attacked by the Bedouins, as they are known to us, although I fancy the general knowledge about the Wahabis and Ibn Savond and Emir Abdullah is slight and the names mean but little to the American people. Nevertheless, here is a case of a member of the league—for the King of the Hejaz is such a member in good and regular standing and signed the treaty by his representatives, Mr. Rustem Haidar and Mr. Abdul Havi Aouni.

Under article 10, if King Hussein appealed to us for aid and protection against external aggression affecting his independence and the boundaries of his kingdom, we should be bound to give that aid and protection and to send American soldiers to Arabia. It is not relevant to say that this is unlikely to occur; that Great Britain is quite able to take care of King Hussein, who is her fair creation, reminding one a little of the Mosquito King, a monarch once developed by Great Britain on the Mosquito Coast of Central America. The fact that we should not be called upon does not alter the right which the King of Hejaz possesses to demand the sending of American troops to Arabia in order to preserve his independence against the assaults of the Wahabis or Bedouins. I am unwilling to give that right to King Hussein, and this illustrates the point which is to me the most objectionable in the league as it stands—the right of other powers to call out American troops and American ships to go to any part of the world, an obligation we are bound to fulfill under the terms of this treaty. I know the answer well—that of course they could not be sent without action by Congress. Congress would have no choice if acting in good faith, and if under article 10 any member of the league summoned us, or if under article 11 the league itself summoned us, we should be bound in honor and morally to obey. There would be no escape except by a breach of faith, and legislation by Congress under those circumstances would be a mockery of independent action. Is it too much to ask that provision should be made that American troops and American ships should never be sent anywhere or ordered to take part in any conflict except after the deliberate action of the American people, expressed according to the Constitution through their chosen representatives in Congress?

Let me now briefly point out the insuperable difficulty which I find in article 15. It begins: "If there should arise between members of the league any dispute likely to lead to a rupture." "Any dispute" covers every possible dispute. It therefore covers a dispute over tariff duties and over immigration. Suppose we have a dispute with Japan or with some European country as to immigration. I put aside tariff duties as less important than immigration. This is not an imaginary case. Of late years there has probably been more international discussion and negotiation about questions growing out of immigration laws than any other one subject. It comes within the definition of "any dispute" at the beginning of article 15. In the eighth paragraph of that article it is said that "if the dispute between the parties is claimed by one of them, and is found by the council to arise out of a matter which, by international law, is solely within the domestic jurisdicion of that party, the council shall so report and shall make no recommendation as to its settlement." That is one of the statements, of which there are several in this treaty, where words are used which it is difficult to believe their authors could have written down in seriousness. They seem to have been put in for the same purpose as what is known in natural history as protective coloring. Protective coloring is intended so to merge the animal, the bird, or the insect in its background that it will be indistinguishable from its surroundings and difficult, if not impossible, to find the elusive and hidden bird, animal, or insect. Protective coloring here is used in the form of words to give an impression that we are perfectly safe upon immigration and tariffs, for example, because questions which international law holds to be solely within domestic jurisdiction are not to have any recommendation from the council, but the dangers are there just the same, like the cunningly colored insect on the tree or the young bird crouching motionless upon the sand. The words and the coloring are alike intended to deceive. I wish somebody would point out to me those provisions of international law which make a list of questions which are hard and fast within the domestic jurisdiction. No such distinction can be applied to tariff duties or immigration nor indeed finally and conclusively to any subject. Have we not seen the school laws of California, most domestic of subjects, rise to the dignity of a grave international dispute? No doubt both import duties and immigration are primarily domestic questions, but they both constantly involve and will continue to involve international effects. Like the protective coloration, this paragraph is wholly worthless unless it is successful in screening from the observer the existence of the animal, insect, or bird which it is desired to conceal. It fails to do so and the real object is detected. But even if this bit of deception was omitted—and so far as the question of immigration or tariff questions are concerned it might as well be—the ninth paragraph brings the important point clearly to the front. Immigration, which is the example I took, can not escape the action of the league by any claim of domestic jurisdiction; it has too many international aspects.

Article 9 says:

> The council may, in any case under this article, refer the dispute to the assembly.

We have our dispute as to immigration with Japan or with one of the Balkan States, let us say. The council has the power to refer the dispute to the assembly. Moreover, the dispute shall be so referred at the request of either party to the dispute, provided that such request be made within 14 days after the submission of the dispute to the council. So that Japan or the Balkan States, for example, with which we may easily have the dispute, ask that it be referred to the assembly, and the immigration question between the United States and Jugoslavia or Japan, as the case may be, goes to the assembly. The United States and Japan or Jugoslavia are excluded from voting, and the provisions of article 12, relating to the action and powers of the council, apply to the action and powers of the assembly, provided, as set forth in article 15, that a report made by the assembly, "if concurred in by the representatives of those members of the league represented on the council and of a majority of the other members of the league, exclusive in each case of the representatives of the parties to the dispute, shall have the same force as a report by the council concurred in by all the members thereof other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute." This course of procedure having been pursued, we find the question of immigration between the United States and Japan is before the assembly for decision. The representatives of the council, except the delegates of the United States and of Japan or Jugoslavia, must all vote unanimously upon it, as I understand it, but a majority of the entire assembly, where the council will have only seven votes, will decide. Can anyone say beforehand what the decision of that assembly will be, in which the United States and Jugoslavia or Japan will have no vote? The question in one case may affect immigration from every country in Europe, although the dispute exists only for one, and in the other the whole matter of Asiatic immigration is involved. Is it too fanciful to think that it might be decided against us? For my purpose it matters not whether it is decided for or against us. An immigration dispute or a dispute over tariff duties, met by the procedure set forth in article 15, comes before the assembly of delegates for a decision by what is practically a majority vote of the entire assembly. That is something to which I do not find myself able to give my assent. So far as immigration is concerned, and also so far as tariff duties, although less important, are concerned, I deny the jurisdiction. There should be no possibility of other nations deciding who shall come into the United States or under what conditions they shall enter. The right to say who shall come into a country is one of the very highest attributes of sovereignty. If a nation can not say without appeal who shall come within its gates and become a part of its citizenship it has ceased to be a sovereign nation. It has become a tributary and a subject nation, and it makes no difference whether it is subject to a league or to a conqueror.

If other nations are willing to subject themselves to such a domination, the United States, to which many immigrants have come and many more will come, ought never to submit to it for a moment. They tell us that so far as Asiatic emigration is concerned there is not the slightest danger that that will ever be forced upon us by the league, because Australia and Canada and New Zealand are equally opposed to it. I think it highly improbable that it would be forced upon us under those conditions, but it is by no means impossible. It is true the United States has one vote, and that England, if you count the King of the Hedjaz, has seven—in all eight—votes; yet it might not be impossible for Japan and China and Siam to rally enough other votes to defeat us; but whether we are protected in that way or not does not matter. The very offering of that explanation accepts the jurisdiction of the league, and personally I can not consent to putting the protection of my country and of her workingmen against undesirable immigration out of our own hands. We and we alone must say who shall come into the United States and become citizens of this Republic, and no one else should have any power to utter one word in regard to it.

Article 21 says:

> Nothing in this covenant shall be deemed to affect the validity of international engagements, such as treaties of arbitration or regional understandings like the Monroe doctrine for securing the maintenance of peace.

This provision did not appear in the first draft of the covenant, and when the President explained the second draft of the convention to the peace conference he said:

> Article 21 is new.

And that was all he said. No one can question the truth of the remark, but I trust I shall not be considered disrespectful if I say that it was not an illuminating statement. The article was new, but the fact of its novelty, which the President declared, was known to everyone who had taken the trouble to read the two documents. We were not left, however, without a fitting explanation. The British delegation took it upon themselves to explain article 21 at some length, and this is what they said:

> Article 21 makes it clear that the covenant is not intended to abrogate or weaken any other agreements, so long as they are consistent with its own terms, into which members of the league may have entered or may hereafter enter for the assurance of peace. Such agreements would include special treaties for compulsory arbitration and military conventions that are genuinely defensive.
> The Monroe doctrine and similar understandings are put in the same category. They have shown themselves in history to be not instruments of national ambition, but guarantees of peace. The origin of the Monroe doctrine is well known. It was proclaimed in 1823 to prevent America from becoming a theater for intrigues of European absolutism. At first a principle of American foreign policy, it has become an international understanding, and it is not illegitimate for the people of the United States to say that the covenant should recognize that fact.
> In its essence it is consistent with the spirit of the covenant, and, indeed, the principles of the league, as expressed in article 10, represent the extension to the whole world of the principles of the doctrine while, should any dispute as to the meaning of the latter ever arise between the American and European powers, the league is there to settle it.

The explanation of Great Britain received the assent of France.

> It seems to me monumentally paradoxical and a trifle infantile—

Says M. Lausanne, solicitor of the "Treaties" and a chief spokesman for M. Clemenceau—> to pretend the contrary.

>
> When the executive council of the league of nations fixes the "reasonable limits of the armament of Peru"; when it shall demand information concerning the naval program of Brazil (art. 7 of the covenant); when it shall tell Argentina what shall be the measure of the "contribution to the armed forces to protect the signatures of the social covenant" (art. 16); when it shall demand the immediate registration of the treaty between the United States and Canada at the seat of the league, it will control, whether it wills or not, the destinies of America.
>
> And when the American States shall be obliged to take a hand in every war or menace of war in Europe (art. 11), they will necessarily fall afoul of the fundamental principle laid down by Monroe.
> * * * If the league takes in the world, then Europe must mix in the affairs of America; if only Europe is included, then America will violate of necessity her own doctrine by intermixing in the affairs of Europe.

It has seemed to me that the British delegation traveled a little out of the precincts of the peace conference when they undertook to explain the Monroe doctrine and tell the United States what it was and what it was not proposed to do with it under the new article. That, however, is merely a matter of taste and judgment. Their statement that the Monroe doctrine under this article, if any question arose in regard to it, would be passed upon and interpreted by the league of nations is absolutely correct. There is no doubt that this is what the article means. Great Britain so stated it, and no American authority, whether friendly or unfriendly to the league, has dared to question it. I have wondered a little why it was left to the British delegation to explain that article, which so nearly concerns the United States, but that was merely a fugitive thought upon which I will not dwell. The statement of M. Lausanne is equally explicit and truthful, but he makes one mistake. He says in substance that if we are to meddle in Europe, Europe can not be excluded from the Americas. He overlooks the fact that the Monroe doctrine also says:

Our policy in regard to Europe, which was adopted at an early stage of the wars which have so long agitated that quarter of the globe, nevertheless remains the same, which is not to interfere in the internal concerns of any of the powers.

The Monroe doctrine was the corollary of Washington's neutrality policy and of his injunction against permanent alliances. It reiterates and reaffirms the principle. We do not seek to meddle in the affairs of Europe and keep Europe out of the Americas. It is as important to keep the United States out of European affairs as to keep Europe out of the American Continents. Let us maintain the Monroe doctrine, then, in its entirety, and not only preserve our own safety, but in this way best promote the real peace of the world. Whenever the preservation of freedom and civilization and the overthrow of a menacing world conqueror summon us we shall respond fully and nobly, as we did in 1917. He who doubts that we should do so has little faith in America. But let it be our own act, and not done reluctantly by the coercion of other nations, at the bidding or by the permission of other countries.

Let me now deal with the article itself. We have here some protective coloration again. The Monroe doctrine is described as a "regional understanding," whatever that may mean. The boundaries between the States of the Union, I suppose, are "regional understandings," if anyone chooses to apply to them that somewhat swollen phraseology. But the Monroe doctrine is no more a regional understanding than it is an "international engagement." The Monroe doctrine was a policy declared by President Monroe. Its immediate purpose was to shut out Europe from interfering with the South American Republics, which the Holy Alliance designed to do. It was stated broadly, however, as we all know, and went much further than that. It was, as I have just said, the corollary of Washington's declaration against our interfering in European questions. It was so regarded by Jefferson at the time, and by John Quincy Adams, who formulated it, and by President Monroe, who declared it. It rested firmly on the great law of self-preservation, which is the basic principle of every independent State. It is not necessary to trace its history, or to point out the extensions which it has received, or its universal acceptance by all American statesmen without regard to party. All Americans have always been for it. They may not have known its details, or read all the many discussions in regard to it, but they knew that it was an American doctrine, and that, broadly stated, it meant the exclusion of Europe from interference with American affairs and from any attempt to colonize or set up new States within the boundaries of the American Continent. I repeat, it was purely an American doctrine, a purely American policy, designed and wisely designed for our defense. It has never been an "international engagement." No nation has ever formally recognized it. It has been the subject of reservation at international conventions by American delegates. It has never been a "regional understanding," or an understanding of any kind with anybody. It was the declaration of the United States of America, in their own behalf, supported by their own power. They brought it into being, and its life was predicated on the force which the United States could place behind it. Unless the United States could sustain it, it would die. The United States has supported it. It has lived—strong, efficient, respected. It is now proposed to kill it by a provision in a treaty for a league of nations.

The instant that the United States, who declared, interpreted, and sustained the doctrine, ceases to be the sole judge of what it means, that instant the Monroe doctrine ceases and disappears from history and from the face of the earth. I think it is just as undesirable to have Europe interfere in American affairs now as Mr. Monroe thought it was in 1823, and equally undesirable that we should be compelled to involve ourselves in all the wars and brawls of Europe. The Monroe doctrine has made for peace. Without the Monroe doctrine we should have had many a struggle with European powers to save ourselves from possible assault and certainly from the necessity of becoming a great military power, always under arms and always ready to resist invasion from States in our near neighborhood. In the interests of the peace of the world it is now proposed to wipe away this American policy, which has been a bulwark and a barrier for peace. With one exception it has always been successful, and then success was only delayed. When we were torn by civil war France saw fit to enter Mexico and endeavored to establish an empire there. When our hands were once free the empire perished, and with it the unhappy tool of the third Napoleon. If the United States had not been rent by civil war no such attempt would have been made, and nothing better illustrates the value to the cause of peace of the Monroe doctrine. Why, in the name of peace, should we extinguish it? Why, in the name of peace, should we be called upon to leave the interpretation of the Monroe doctrine to other nations? It is an American policy. It is our own. It has guarded us well, and I for one can never find consent in my heart to destroy it by a clause in a treaty and hand over its body for dissection to the nations of Europe. If we need authority to demonstrate what the Monroe doctrine has meant to the United States we can not do better than quote the words of Grover Cleveland, who directed Mr. Olney to notify the world that "to-day the United States is practically sovereign on this continent, and its fiat is law to which it confines its interposition." Theodore Roosevelt, in the last article written before his death, warned us, his countrymen, that we are "in honor bound to keep ourselves so prepared that the Monroe doctrine shall be accepted as immutable international law." Grover Cleveland was a Democrat and Theodore Roosevelt was a Republican, but they were both Americans, and it is the American spirit which has carried this country always to victory and which should govern us to-day, and not the international spirit, which would in the name of peace hand the United States over bound hand and foot to obey the fiat of other powers.

Another point in this covenant where change must be made in order to protect the safety of the United States in the future is in article 1, where withdrawal is provided for. This provision was an attempt to meet the very general objection to the first draft of the league, that there was no means of getting out of it without denouncing the treaty; that is, there was no arrangement for the withdrawal of any nation. As it now stands it reads that—

Any member of the league may, after two years' notice of its intention to do so, withdraw from the league, provided that all its international obligations and all its obligations under this covenant shall have been fulfilled at the time of its withdrawal.

The right of withdrawal is given by this clause, although the time for notice, two years, is altogether too long. Six months or a year would be found, I think, in most treaties to be the normal period fixed for notice of withdrawal. But whatever virtue there may be in the right thus conferred is completely nullified by the proviso. The right of withdrawal can not be exercised until all the international obligations and all the obligations of the withdrawing nations have been fulfilled. The league alone can decide whether "all international obligations and all obligations under this covenant" have been fulfilled, and this would require, under the provisions of the league, a unanimous vote, so that any nation desiring to withdraw could not do so, even on the two years' notice, if one nation voted that the obligations had not been fulfilled. Remember that this gives the league not only power to review all our obligations under the covenant but all our treaties with all nations, for every one of those is an "international obligation."

Are we deliberately to put ourselves in fetters and be examined by the league of nations as to whether we have kept faith with Cuba or Panama before we can be permitted to leave the league? This seems to me humiliating, to say the least. The right of withdrawal, if it is to be of any value whatever, must be absolute, because otherwise a nation desiring to withdraw could be held in the league by objections from other nations until the very act which induces the nation to withdraw had been completed, until the withdrawing nation had been forced to send troops to take part in a war with which it had no concern and upon which it did not desire to enter. It seems to me vital to the safety of the United States not only that this provision should be eliminated and the right to withdraw made absolute but that the period of withdrawal should be much reduced. As it stands it is practically no better in this respect than the first league draft, which contained no provision for withdrawal at all, because the proviso here inserted so encumbers it that every nation to all intents and purposes must remain a member of the league indefinitely unless all the other members are willing that it should retire. Such a provision as this, ostensibly framed to meet the objection, has the defect which other similar gestures to give an impression of meeting objections have, that it apparently keeps the promise to the ear but most certainly breaks it to the hope.

I have dwelt only upon those points which seem to me most dangerous. There are, of course, many others, but these points, in the interest not only of the safety of the United States but of the maintenance of the treaty and the peace of the world, should be dealt with here before it is too late. Once in the league the chance of amendment is so slight that it is not worth considering. Any analysis of the provisions of this league covenant, however, brings out in startling relief one great fact. Whatever may be said, it is not a league of peace; it is an alliance, dominated at the present moment by five great powers, really by three, and it has all the marks of an alliance. The development of international law is neglected. The court which is to decide disputes brought before it fills but a small place. The conditions for which this league really provides with the utmost care are political conditions, not judicial questions, to be reached by the executive council and the assembly, purely political bodies without any trace of a judicial character about them. Such being its machinery, the control being in the hands of political appointees whose votes will be controlled by interest and expediency, it exhibits that most marked characteristic of an alliance—that its decisions are to be carried out by force. Those articles upon which the whole structure rests are articles which provide for the use of force; that is, for war. This league to enforce peace does a great deal for enforcement and very little for peace. It makes more essential provisions looking to war than to peace for the settlement of disputes.

Article 10 I have already discussed. There is no question that the preservation of a State against external aggression can contemplate nothing but war. In article 11, again, the league is authorized to take any action which may be necessary to safeguard the peace of the world. "Any action" includes war. We also have specific provisions for a boycott, which is a form of economic warfare. The use of troops might be avoided, but the enforcement of a boycott would require blockades in all probability, and certainly a boycott in its essence is simply an effort to starve a people into submission, to ruin their trade, and, in the case of nations which are not self-supporting, to cut off their food supply. The misery and suffering caused by such a measure as this may easily rival that caused by actual war. Article 16 embodies the boycott and also, in the last paragraph, provides explicitly for war. We are told that the word "recommend" has no binding force; it constitutes a moral obligation; that is all. But it means that if we, for example, should refuse to accept the recommendation we should nullify the operation of article 16 and, to that extent, of the league. It seems to me that to attempt to relieve us of clearly imposed duties by saying that the word "recommend" is not binding is an escape of which no nation regarding the sanctity of treaties and its own honor would care to avail itself. The provisions of article 16 are extended to States outside the league who refuse to obey its command to come in and submit themselves to its jurisdiction—another provision for war.

Taken altogether, these provisions for war present what to my mind is the gravest objection to this league in its present form. We are told that of course nothing will be done in the way of warlike acts without the assent of Congress. If that is true let us say so in the covenant. But as it stands there is no doubt whatever in my mind that American troops and American ships may be ordered to any part of the world by nations other than the United States, and that is a proposition to which I for one can never assent. It must be made perfectly clear that no American soldiers, not even a corporal's guard, that no American sailors, not even the crew of a submarine, can ever be engaged in war or ordered anywhere except by the constitutional authorities of the United States. To Congress is granted by the Constitution the right to declare war, and nothing that would take the troops out of the country at the bidding or demand of other nations should ever be permitted except through congressional action. The lives of Americans must never be sacrificed except by the will of the American people expressed through their chosen Representatives in Congress. This is a point upon which no doubt can be permitted. American soldiers and American sailors have never failed the country when the country called upon them. They went in their hundreds of thousands into the war just closed. They went to die for the great cause of freedom and of civilization. They went at their service. We were late in entering the war. We made no preparation, as we ought to have done, for the ordeal which was clearly coming upon us; but we went and we turned the wavering scale. It was done by the American soldier, the American sailor, and the spirit and energy of the American people. They overrode all obstacles and all shortcomings on the part of the administration or of Congress and gave to their country a great place in the great victory. It was the first time we had been called upon to rescue the civilized world. Did we fail? On the contrary, we succeeded, succeeded largely and nobly, and we did it without any command from any league of nations. When the emergency came we met it, and we were able to meet it because we had built up on this continent the greatest and most powerful Nation in the world, built it up under our own policies, in our own way, and one great element of our strength was the fact that we had held aloof and had not thrust ourselves into European quarrels; that we had no selfish interest to serve. We made great sacrifices. We have done splendid work. I believe that we do not require to be told by foreign nations when we shall do work which freedom and civilization require. I think we can move to victory much better under our own command than under the command of others. Let us unite with the world to promote the peaceable settlement of all international disputes. Let us try to develop international law. Let us associate ourselves with the other nations for these purposes. But let us retain in our own hands and in our own control the lives of the youth of the land. Let no American be sent into battle except by the constituted authorities of his own country and by the will of the people of the United States.

Those of us, Mr. President, who are either wholly opposed to the league, or who are trying to preserve the independence and the safety of the United States by changing the terms of the league, and who are endeavoring to make the league, if we are to be a member of it, less certain to promote war instead of peace have been reproached with selfishness in our outlook and with a desire to keep our country in a state of isolation. So far as the question of isolation goes, it is impossible to isolate the United States. I well remember the time, 20 years ago, when eminent Senators and other distinguished gentlemen who were opposing the Philippines and shrieking about imperialism sneered at the statement made by some of us, that the United States had become a world power. I think no one now would question that the Spanish war marked the entrance of the United States into world affairs to a degree which had never obtained before. It was both an inevitable and an irrevocable step, and our entrance into the war with Germany certainly showed once and for all that the United States was not unmindful of its world responsibilities. We may set aside all this empty talk about isolation. Nobody expects to isolate the United States or to make it a hermit Nation, which is a sheer absurdity. But there is a wide difference between taking a suitable part and bearing a due responsibility in world affairs and plunging the United States into every controversy and conflict on the face of the globe. By meddling in all the differences which may arise among any portion or fragment of humankind we simply fritter away our influence and injure ourselves to no good purpose. We shall be of far more value to the world and its peace by occupying, so far as possible, the situation which we have occupied for the last 20 years and by adhering to the policy of Washington and Hamilton, of Jefferson and Monroe, under which we have risen to our present greatness and prosperity. The fact that we have been separated by our geographical situation and by our consistent policy from the broils of Europe has made us more than any one thing capable of performing the great work which we performed in the war against Germany, and our disinterestedness is of far more value to the world than our eternal meddling in every possible dispute could ever be.

Now as to our selfishness. I have no desire to boast that we are better than our neighbors, but the fact remains that this Nation in making peace with Germany had not a single selfish or individual interest to serve. All we asked was that Germany should be rendered incapable of again breaking forth, with all the horrors incident to German warfare, upon an unoffending world, and that demand was shared by every free nation and indeed by humanity itself. For ourselves we asked absolutely nothing. We have not asked any government or governments to guarantee our boundaries or our political independence. We have no fear in regard to either. We have sought no territory, no privileges, no advantages, for ourselves. That is the fact. It is apparent on the face of the treaty. I do not mean to reflect upon a single one of the powers with which we have been associated in the war against Germany, but there is not one of them which has not sought individual advantages for their own national benefit. I do not criticize their desires at all. The services and sacrifices of England and France and Belgium and Italy are beyond estimate and beyond praise. I am glad they should have what they desire for their own welfare and safety. But they all receive under the peace territorial and commercial benefits. We are asked to give, and we in no way seek to take. Surely it is not too much to insist that when we are offered nothing but the opportunity to give and to aid others we should have the right to say what sacrifices we shall make and what the magnitude of our gifts shall be. In the prosecution of the war we gave unstintedly American lives and American treasure. When the war closed we had 3,000,000 men under arms. We were turning the country into a vast workshop for war. We advanced ten billions to our allies. We refused no assistance that we could possibly render. All the great energy and power of the Republic were put at the service of the good cause. We have not been ungenerous. We have been devoted to the cause of freedom, humanity, and civilization everywhere. Now we are asked, in the making of peace, to sacrifice our sovereignty in important respects, to involve ourselves almost without limit in the affairs of other nations and to yield up policies and rights which we have maintained throughout our history. We are asked to incur liabilities to an unlimited extent and furnish assets at the same time which no man can measure. I think it is not only our right but our duty to determine how far we shall go. Not only must we look carefully to see where we are being led into endless disputes and entanglements, but we must not forget that we have in this country millions of people of foreign birth and parentage.

Our one great object is to make all these people Americans so that we may call on them to place America first and serve America as they have done in the war just closed. We can not Americanize them if we are continually thrusting them back into the quarrels and difficulties of the countries from which they came to us. We shall fill this land with political disputes about the troubles and quarrels of other countries. We shall have a large portion of our people voting not on American questions and not on what concerns the United States but dividing on issues which concern foreign countries alone. That is an unwholesome and perilous condition to force upon this country. We must avoid it. We ought to reduce to the lowest possible point the foreign questions in which we involve ourselves. Never forget that this league is primarily—I might say overwhelmingly—a political organization, and I object strongly to having the politics of the United States turn upon disputes where deep feeling is aroused but in which we have no direct interest. It will all tend to delay the Americanization of our great population, and it is more important not only to the United States but to the peace of the world to make all these people good Americans than it is to determine that some piece of territory should belong to one European country rather than to another. For this reason I wish to limit strictly our interference in the affairs of Europe and of Africa. We have interests of our own in Asia and in the Pacific which we must guard upon our own account, but the less we undertake to play the part of umpire and thrust ourselves into European conflicts the better for the United States and for the world.

It has been reiterated here on this floor, and reiterated to the point of weariness, that in every treaty there is some sacrifice of sovereignty. That is not a universal truth by any means, but it is true of some treaties and it is a platitude which does not require reiteration. The question and the only question before us here is how much of our sovereignty we are justified in sacrificing. In what I have already said about other nations putting us into war I have covered one point of sovereignty which ought never to be yielded—the power to send American soldiers and sailors everywhere, which ought never to be taken from the American people or impaired in the slightest degree. Let us beware how we palter with our independence. We have not reached the great position from which we were able to come down into the field of battle and help to save the world from tyranny by being guided by others. Our vast power has all been built up and gathered together by ourselves alone. We forced our way upward from the days of the Revolution, through a world often hostile and always indifferent. We owe no debt to anyone except to France in that Revolution, and those policies and those rights on which our power has been founded should never be lessened or weakened. It will be no service to the world to do so and it will be of intolerable injury to the United States. We will do our share. We are ready and anxious to help in all ways to preserve the world's peace. But we can do it best by not crippling ourselves.

I am as anxious as any human being can be to have the United States render every possible service to the civilization and the peace of mankind, but I am certain we can do it best by not putting ourselves in leading strings or subjecting our policies and our sovereignty to other nations. The independence of the United States is not only more precious to ourselves but to the world than any single possession. Look at the United States to-day. We have made mistakes in the past. We have had shortcomings. We shall make mistakes in the future and fall short of our own best hopes. But none the less is there any country to-day on the face of the earth which can compare with this in ordered liberty, in peace, and in the largest freedom? I feel that I can say this without being accused of undue boastfulness, for it is the simple fact, and in making this treaty and taking on these obligations all that we do is in a spirit of unselfishness and in a desire for the good of mankind. But it is well to remember that we are dealing with nations every one of which has a direct individual interest to serve, and there is grave danger in an unshared idealism. Contrast the United States with any country on the face of the earth to-day and ask yourself whether the situation of the United States is not the best to be found. I will go as far as anyone in world service, but the first step to world service is the maintenance of the United States. You may call me selfish, if you will, conservative or reactionary, or use any other harsh adjective you see fit to apply, but an American I was born, an American I have remained all my life. I can never be anything else but an American, and I must think of the United States first, and when I think of the United States first in an arrangement like this I am thinking of what is best for the world, for if the United States fails the best hopes of mankind fail with it. I have never had but one allegiance—I can not divide it now. I have loved but one flag and I can not share that devotion and give affection to the mongrel banner invented for a league. Internationalism, illustrated by the Bolshevik and by the men to whom all countries are alike provided they can make money out of them, is to me repulsive. National I must remain, and in that way I like all other Americans can render the amplest service to the world. The United States is the world's best hope, but if you fetter her in the interests and quarrels of other nations, if you tangle her in the intrigues of Europe, you will destroy her power for good and endanger her very existence. Leave her to march freely through the centuries to come as in the years that have gone. Strong, generous, and confident, she has nobly served mankind. Beware how you trifle with your marvelous inheritance, this great land of ordered liberty, for if we stumble and fall freedom and civilization everywhere will go down in ruin.

We are told that we shall "break the heart of the world" if we do not take this league just as it stands. I fear that the hearts of the vast majority of mankind would beat on strongly and steadily and without any quickening if the league were to perish altogether. If it should be effectively and beneficiently changed the people who would lie awake in sorrow for a single night could be easily gathered in one not very large room but those who would draw a long breath of relief would reach to millions.

We hear much of visions and I trust we shall continue to have visions and dream dreams of a fairer future for the race. But visions are one thing and visionaries are another, and the mechanical appliances of the rhetorician designed to give a picture of a present which does not exist and of a future which no man can predict are as unreal and short lived as the steam or canvas clouds, the angels suspended on wires and the artificial lights of the stage. They pass with the moment of effect and are shabby and tawdry in the daylight. Let us at least be real. Washington's entire honesty of mind and his fearless look into the face of all facts are qualities which can never go out of fashion and which we should all do well to imitate.

Ideals have been thrust upon us as an argument for the league until the healthy mind which rejects cant revolts from them. Are ideals confined to this deformed experiment upon a noble purpose, tainted, as it is, with bargains and tied to a peace treaty which might have been disposed of long ago to the great benefit of the world if it had not been compelled to carry this rider on its back? "Post equitem sedet atra cura," Horace tells us, but no blacker care ever sat behind any rider than we shall find in this covenant of doubtful and disputed interpretation as it now perches upon the treaty of peace.

No doubt many excellent and patriotic people see a coming fulfillment of noble ideals in the words "League for Peace." We all respect and share these aspirations and desires, but some of us see no hope, but rather defeat, for them in this murky covenant. For we, too, have our ideals, even if we differ from those who have tried to establish a monopoly of idealism. Our first ideal is our country, and we see her in the future, as in the past, giving service to all her people and to the world. Our ideal of the future is that she should continue to render that service of her own free will. She has great problems of her own to solve, very grim and perilous problems, and a right solution, if we can attain to it, would largely benefit mankind. We would have our country strong to resist a peril from the West, as she has flung back the German menace from the East. We would not have our politics distracted and embittered by the dissensions of other lands. We would not have our country's vigor exhausted, or her moral force abated, by everlasting meddling and muddling in every quarrel, great and small, which afflicts the world. Our ideal is to make her ever stronger and better and finer, because in that way alone, as we believe, can she be of the greatest service to the world's peace and to the welfare of mankind. [Prolonged applause in the galleries.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I hesitate very much to undertake to reply extemporaneously and in a few minutes to the greatest possible prepared presentation of the selfishness of American policy ever made even by the Senator from Massachusetts. I would have to have more egotism than even I have if I thought I could answer fully "off the bat" the things the Senator from Massachusetts has been cogitating and laboriously studying to express for three weeks, more or less, with a view to capturing the Senate and the galleries, whose occupants have come by announcement to hear him to-day. It is not a new presentation of the personality of the Senator from Massachusetts. He has always attempted to make a show of himself. [Manifestation in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. Just a moment——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope the Chair will not interfere with the galleries.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The occupants of the galleries violated the rules of the Senate in their applause of the Senator from Massachusetts, but the Chair was patient with them. They have, however, no right to do it, and if there is another manifestation of approval or disapproval the Chair will order the galleries cleared. The occupants of the galleries are the guests of the Senate. They ought to be ashamed of themselves.

Mr. WILLIAMS. As I was about to say, the Senator from Massachusetts has always attempted to make a show of himself as being "nonpartisan," or "nonsectional," and fair and impartial. I remember that that was his position when he fathered the Force bill against the southern white people in the House of Representatives. There was nothing more affecting than the concluding sentence of the Senator's address at that time, paying a high tribute to himself as being about the only man devoted to Americanism and devoted to the United States.

Mr. President, the Senator says "we must render service of our own free will" to the world—service of our own free will. Mr. President, how can any nation, how can any people, how can any man render service of their or its own free will? We are too indissolubly connected with one another for that. I can not render service in Yazoo County, Miss., of my own free will. I must consult the other people who are my neighbors. Yazoo County can not render service of its own free will. It must consult the other counties in Mississippi. Mississippi can not render service of its own free will. It must consult and agree to a line of conduct with the balance of the States of the United States. The United States can not, if they would, render service of their own free will. Ties of commerce, literature, law, religion, ties of history, ties of future idealism as well as of past traditions, bind us to the balance of the world; and the man who stands forward in the twentieth century and says that any country—I care not even if it be this country, the greatest and the wealthiest if not the most intelligent country upon the surface of the earth—can direct its own course to please itself, regardless of the balance of the world, has not sense enough to deserve to be a member of a town council.

Mr. President, all the crossing of "t's" and the dotting of "i's" that the Senator from Massachusetts has recourse to does not make me forget that he has "neglected the weightier matters of the law." What is the weightier matter of the law here? It is peace amongst the nations of the world! Has he shown the slightest sympathy with the desire to have it? Leave out his crossing of "t's" and his dotting of "i's" and his finally carefully three-weeks prepared peroration, intended to appeal to the Senate and the galleries, and which did appeal to them. Has he shown the slightest heart sympathy with the desire of the world to have peace? Has he shown any sympathy with the desire of the mother that her son shall not uselessly die upon the battle field? Has he shown the slightest degree of sympathy with the wish of the father that his son should die only a noble death, in defense of his country, and without regard to any other quarrel that the world might have originating in Serbia or China?

Oh, Mr. President, it is easy to dot "i's" and cross "t's," and it is easy for the Senator from Massachusetts to scorn and cast obloquy upon the sentence of the President when the President said "If you defeat the league of nations you will break the heart of the world." Has the Senator had any sympathy with breaking the heart of the world? Has he expressed any idea that he would not break the heart of the world? With an absolute, cold, New England, Brahmin cynicism that invites the scorn of every honest, human-loving man he merely made fun of the phrase. It is a slight thing to "break the heart of the world"! It is a little bit of a thing! It does not make any difference, provided Republican policies in the Senate of the United States are at stake! What do we care about the world, anyhow? "We are the United States." What do we care about the heart of the world? We are furnishing the mind of the world, or we fondly imagine that we are.

And then the Senator goes back in history, and he tells us of all the brave dreams that brave men have ever dreamt, of all the good and sweet dreams that good men have ever dreamt about the peace of the world, and then he makes fun of it all—not a real, genuine, human fun, because he has not imagination enough to do that, but he makes fun of it in his cold, cynical way; the upshot of it all being, "What have we got to do with the brave words of the past?" as he calls them.

Mr. President, they were brave words; they were true words; they were honest words; and they were words worthy of the worship of mankind. Jesus Christ uttered some of them. Alfred Tennyson uttered some of them. Immanuel Kant uttered some of them. Henry IV of France uttered some of them. Oh, it is awfully easy for the Senator to say, "Yes; they have all been uttered, but they have all failed." They did fail, but why? Because the world had not then reached the state of civilization where the receptiveness of the world could meet the initiative of the dreamer. The question now is whether we have even yet come to that stage of the world's enlightenment.

The Senator after a while concludes his historical recitation of all the attempts that have been made for the peace of the world by bringing in the Holy Alliance, and he attempts to identify the Holy Alliance with this league of peace. Why, you might as well attempt to identify the son of one father and mother with the son of another father and mother, forgetting the birth source of each altogether. The Holy Alliance came from autocrats seeking the perpetuation of autocratic power. It failed. Does it follow necessarily, therefore, that an agreement between the peoples of the earth seeking peace in the name and interest of popular power shall fail?

Oh, but the Senator says, "You are talking to us about internationalism, and I want to talk about nationalism." Do you imagine, Mr. President, that I surrender my nationalism whenever I confess myself an inhabitant of the earth, subject to international influence and international ethics and international ideals and international traditions, any more than I surrender my identity as my father's son because I meet your daughter or your son in just intercourse? Where does this narrow chauvinism come from? It comes from original tribal relations, and the world is past that. The Senator can stand there and read, read, reread—not speak—his carefully prepared sentences with the view of controlling politics in America as well as he can, but he can not blot out the fact that while I am a citizen of America I am also a citizen of the world. He can not even blot out the fact that he is an inhabitant of the world, whether he is a willing citizen or not. I imagine he is not a willing citizen, because he never would have consented to be naturalized under the world's terms. He has never consented to record himself as a child of God and an inhabitant of the globe and a citizen of the world or, if so, he failed to let any knowledge of the fact slip his lips this morning.

Are we, individual against individual, to fight our quarrels out? Are we, county against county, to fight our quarrels out? Are we, State against State, to fight our quarrels out? Are we, nation against nation, to fight our quarrels out, when we can of our own free will construct some machinery that will come to a fairer and a more just conclusion of our quarrels? I imagine not; but that is the question presented to the American people to-day. It is not whether you would, if you could, amend article 10, or article 11, or article 22, or article 25 of this treaty; but the question is, "Take it all in all, as a measure for the advancement of civilization and peace and humanity and justice, does it meet with your approval or does it not?" If as a whole it does not, cast it aside; but if as a whole it does, although, in your opinion, some things in it ought to be amended, then you are a narrow-minded, selfish ass if you cast it aside. You are not only a narrow-minded ass, but you are a narrow-minded barbarian, because you throw aside justice and humanity and civilization and peace for a clause, the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i."

I listened very attentively to the Senator from Massachusetts and, as I said a moment ago, I hesitated very much about making an extemporaneous reply to a long-prepared expression made for national, international, and political purposes; but I boldly say that he never touched the question of the peace of the world; never seemed to recognize that as the primary question.

Now, I understand some men in connection with this question. I understand the man that frankly comes forward and says, "I am an American, and I am nothing else, and I do not want to be anything else. I do not acknowledge that I do inhabit the earth. I do not acknowledge that I am a citizen of the world. I do not acknowledge that I have any duty to Frenchmen or British or Italians or Germans or anybody else. I want you to let me alone until I can conquer Mexico, and add its three or four northern Provinces to the United States, and then you can let your league of nations play if you want to." I could understand that, if only I had sufficient interests down in Mexico to make it my business to attend alone to that sort of thing and were selfish enough to consider it primary. I also understand the position of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] when he just simply goes back a hundred years and says: "I plant myself on George Washington," notwithstanding steamships and wireless and everything else.

When we had thirteen little, weak Colonies along the Atlantic coast, Washington said: "Let us keep out of a row." Why? Because there was no row that we could enter into that we would not get the worst of. I understand that. But I do not understand, Mr. President, the idea of a man who comes here with a typewritten presentation, carefully prepared for three weeks or more, with the idea of appealing to the galleries—beforehand invited to come—even more than to the Senate, an appeal to the galleries thus invited not in the interest of peace, not in the interest of humanity, not in the interests of the mothers of children, not in the interests of the sweethearts of young men, but in the interest of a narrow Chauvinistic policy, which shall be mainly tortured here at home for the purpose of securing Republican partisan success. I am a partisan Democrat. I would do most anything for the Democratic Party except just about that.

Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts inveighs against "interference in the internal affairs of countries," while the treaty says expressly that that shall not be done.

He speaks of our being "controlled by the league," and you will remember that when he first began this discussion his complaint was that Wilson had controlled the league, not that the league had controlled Wilson. The complaint was that Wilson had gone off as a high American "boss" to Europe, had taken everything in his own hands, and "run the whole business." What danger is there of our being controlled by the league, except if we should be wrong—"palpably and plainly and obviously wrong"—and the league should be consequently unanimously against us, and "palpably and plainly and obviously" right?

The Senator from Massachusetts quarrels with the phrase of the covenant of the league which says that "any war or threat of war is a matter of universal concern." The league does not there attempt to make us make war or declare war or even go to economic pressure. It merely says that where a menace to the peace of the world is brought before the league, the league shall take cognizance of it and make investigation and make a recommendation. Even then the council must vote unanimously, and the American delegate must vote for it. If there is no minority report, to use a congressional phrase, then the league can make inquisition and it can make recommendation, and that is all it can do.

But the Senator from Massachusetts says a "recommendation" amounts to an order and a mandate. Who ever in the world, after reading this treaty, has said so except him and except a few men dealing with this question in the same narrow spirit in which he is dealing with it?

If I should be called in to make a recommendation for the settlement of a quarrel between the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], who is there that says that the recommendation is an order, that it is something that binds either Senator legally and morally to comply with it unless his own sense of ethics makes him comply with it?

My quarrel with this league of nations is that it does not go far enough. Its recommendations ought to be followed by an order, and that ought to be followed up by physical force if necessary. That is my own private opinion. I say that if the Senator from North Carolina and the Senator from Colorado left the settlement of a difficulty to me as an umpire, there ought to be some way to make them comply with the decision.

But that is not the league, that is not the treaty, and the Senator from Massachusetts had no right to torture it into having any such meaning. "Controlled by the league!" We, the United States! "Bound to send American soldiers to Arabia," he said. I defy even the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], termagant on this question as he is—and I am using the word "termagant" purposely—to find a single sentence, phrase, or word that compels us anywhere at any time to send any soldiers to Arabia; and, of course, he knows that the Senator from Massachusetts knew almost as much about this treaty as he does, and he knew that the Senator from Massachusetts knew that nothing of that sort appeared in it. But it appealed to the galleries. The packed and invited galleries could shout. It "tickled the ears of the groundlings, although it made the judicious to grieve."

Then the Senator from Massachusetts speaks of "the right of all the powers to 'call out' American sailors and soldiers." I want to appeal especially to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], because however mistaken he may be, however radical he may be, I pick on him as a man on the other side of the Senate who is honest; at any rate, who has intellectual integrity—and I do not mean by that that there are on his side no others who have, of course. But the Senator from Massachusetts speaks of the right of all the powers to "call out American soldiers and sailors." I wish that the Senator from Idaho would tell me when he gets the floor—or now, if he chooses—where this treaty at any place gives any right to the league to "call out American soldiers or sailors." He can not do it, because it is not in the treaty, and the Senator from Massachusetts knew it was not in it. He knew it as well as I do. Why did he say it? To "tickle the ears of the groundlings," while he "made the judicious to grieve."

There is not a thing in this treaty that is even as strong as the original confederacy between the 13 American colonies, and that confederacy was strong enough, I bid gentlemen to mark, to win American independence and strong enough after that to keep the peace among American States after they had ceased to be colonies until the new Constitution was adopted. But there was never any right in the Continental Congress to summon a single soldier from North Carolina or Virginia or to levy a single dollar of taxes upon a citizen of North Carolina or of Virginia or of Massachusetts. All that the Continental Congress could do was to make recommendations and to remind the people and governments of the Colonies of the fact that they had not filled out their quota of men and money. Some of them never filled it. Some of them have never filled it yet. There are two States in the Union that have never paid what they owe in money for American independence.

But that "league of States"—the Continental Congress—that forerunner of a "league of nations," was strong enough to win American independence, and strong enough to maintain American peace until the adoption of the new Constitution—the present Constitution. There was not a word in the Constitution of the Continental Congress that gave any right to summon a soldier from Virginia or Massachusetts to the colors, or to levy in taxes one dollar upon a citizen of Massachusetts or of Virginia. But they did have the right of the expression of "the decent public opinion" of America. The league expresses the "decent opinion" of the civilized world.

A gentleman every now and then tells me, "Here is this particular clause, and here is this one. I do not find that you have military and naval force behind it in the league of nations. What power, therefore, has this thing in itself? How can it have its decrees executed?"

My answer is, "The same way that the Continental Congress had its decrees executed—approximately, though not perfectly." It was not without reason that, in drawing up the Declaration of Independence, Thomas Jefferson said that we owed an account of our action to the decent opinion of the world. There is nothing stronger in the world than the decent opinion of the world.

If any Senator came to my county to-morrow, and the public opinion of my county demanded that he should do certain things, and he stood out in narrow individualism and said that he would not, how long would he last? He would soon find it necessary to move back to wherever he came from.

Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts goes on speaking about international action binding us, and trammeling us, and making slaves of us—slaves to a lot of people of alien birth and alien residence. Where does he find that in the treaty?

Everything of any importance must be done by the council by unanimous vote, and our representative must vote for it. Who is our representative upon the council? Is he an independent delegate? Of course not. He is an ambassador of the United States in an international congress. To whom is he subject for orders? To the Government of the United States. There is not a case that could arise under this treaty where there can be action upon any important matter without our own consent in the council. There are cases where a majority may control questions of procedure, but they are negligible in number and importance.

Then the Senator from Massachusetts says that we will not have any vote in the council or in the league of nations upon certain questions to be decided against us. He knew better than that. What the treaty says is that if the vote shall be unanimous, leaving out of consideration the votes of the litigants, of the contestants, of the parties who quarrel with one another, the council may do what? It may make a recommendation; and if it make a recommendation, what shall follow? That any country which makes war against the country accepting the recommendation shall be subject to expulsion, shall be subject to economic pressure, and shall be subject to such other penalties as the league of nations may agree to visit upon it by unanimous vote of the council and a majority of the league.

Senators, I ask you this question, in ordinary, plain, Mississippi planter's common sense, leaving out finesse, leaving out "possibilities," and all that, Can you imagine a case with which we could be confronted where the whole world except ourselves would be against us unless we were wrong?

Of course, if anyone wants us left free, for example, to go down and invade and conquer Mexico and annex two or three of her Provinces, I will not argue with him; I will not even talk to him. He is beneath my contempt; he is beneath the contempt of the world. But if your object is justice and right and righteousness, can you imagine a case where Great Britain and the British Empire and France and Italy all should be opposed to us unanimously and we alone stand out? I can imagine but one conceivable case of that sort, and that would arise under the Monroe doctrine—some question affecting the Western Hemisphere. When we come to that question, the treaty itself says that the Monroe doctrine is validated and is excepted from the jurisdiction of the league. Gentlemen say, "But in saying you except the Monroe doctrine you misdescribe it." I do not care whether we do or not; we have named it, and everybody knows what is meant by it.

Then the Senator very carefully, very dexterously, with a velvet glove in an iron hand, referred to the question of immigration. He attempts to frighten us about our rights in prohibiting immigrants from coming into the United States. If there is a question well settled in international law, it is that a nation has the right to say who shall be welcome in its house, just as I have the right to say who shall be a guest in my house. But suppose that were not true; suppose that you can imagine half of the world combining against the United States to make us admit Japanese immigrants. I started to say negro immigrants from the West Indies, but we are already admitting them by our own will and power, and they are infinitely less desirable citizens than the Japanese; but that is because you boys up North do not want to lose any votes when you go before the negroes in your States. But suppose that combination to make us admit Japanese were sought, how many nations could you get to combine against us? Could you get Great Britain? Why, if she undertook to force Japanese immigration upon Canada, or Chinese or Japanese immigration upon Australia, or either one or the other upon South Africa or New Zealand to-morrow, she would break up the British Empire by internal revolt. Do you imagine any of the great wise statesmen of Great Britain, who, whatever else they have been in the past, have never been fools, do not know that?

Will any Senator tell me that Canada is less opposed to Japanese immigration than we are? Will any Senator tell me that Australia is not three times as much opposed to all sorts of oriental immigration as we are? Will any Senator deny the fact that South Africa denied the right even of her "fellow subjects" of British East India to enter into her borders, and that Great Britain from London had to respect her wish?

Then the Senator says in high language that he "will not vote for anything that leaves to foreign nations the question of what men or what goods shall come into the United States." Who wants to do that? Who has proposed to do it? That is another case of "tickling the ears of the groundlings and causing the judicious to grieve." There is not a word in all this treaty that undertakes to decide what men shall enter into the United States or what goods shall enter in. On the contrary, by omission in the first place and by direct expression to the contrary in the second place, all consideration of questions of that sort is excluded from the jurisdiction of the league.

Then the Senator says we are committed, if we adopt the league, to union in a concern out of which we can not get unless all the other powers of the world let us out. The wording of the league is that any nation may withdraw after two years' notice "if it has complied with its international obligations." Unlike some of my Democratic colleagues and some advocates of the league, I take it by that that both the United States and the league must pass upon the question whether we have or have not complied with our obligations. But the league must decide against us unanimously before we can be held, leaving our own vote out of consideration, of course.

Let me make a statement of a case and see how far you are willing to go. Suppose that as the result of this treaty finally, in the treaty with Austria, let us say, we should provide that $300,000,000 should be paid to Serbia as reparation for her devastation in the most unjust manner, and suppose that twenty million of that fell to the United States, and suppose the utterly unsupposable case, that the United States gave notice to get out of the league without paying the $20,000,000, would you think that was honest? Do you not think before anybody retires from any sort of partnership he ought to pay his share of the liabilities of the partnership? Can you say that anything else is even passably honest? Would you, as an honest man, seek to enter a partnership from which you could retire to-morrow without paying your share of the liabilities? If you would seek to do it, you would be inchoately dishonest, and if you did it you would be actually dishonest.

Then the Senator speaks of the marked characteristics of the league as being something to be carried out by war. Is not this the funniest thing you ever heard of? The Senator from Massachusetts, opposing the league in behalf of the peace of the world and advancement of the cause of peace, objects to the very league peace itself on the ground that it has to be carried out by war. Not one-half nor one-third of the cases that can arise under this league would be carried out by war. Of course, there is a menace of war upon the part of the league behind some of the clauses, just as there was a menace of war behind the doctrine of Monroe. Substantially it meant "if the European powers dare to attempt to reconquer the Spanish Provinces here it is such an unfriendly act that the United States will resist it by war." But will anybody say that the Monroe doctrine was a war measure? It was, upon the contrary, a peace measure. Its very object was to give notice to the world that if they did not keep the peace we should make war, and they kept the peace, and they kept it for over 100 years without the loss of a man's life and without the expenditure of a dollar.

There is not a case under this treaty where armed force could be used against any lawless nation except when that nation had shown bad faith, when the lawless nation had, after submission to arbitration, refused to abide by the decision, or where that nation had refused to go into arbitration when the other nation was willing to go; and even there the first punishment is not war, but it is about the third problematical punishment. Why should she not be punished? But you say it might be the United States. I say, No; it might not be the United States. The United States is never going to behave that way. I would be willing to expatriate myself if I thought the United States would ever submit to arbitration and then refuse to abide by it. I would be willing to expatriate myself if I thought the United States would ever agree beforehand in settlement of a dispute to go into arbitration and then not go into it. I deny that it is a possibility, except in the infinite sense in which somebody said that it was "possible for God to tell a lie" provided only that God wanted to, which is irreconcilable with God's nature. That is old scholasticism of the worst type.

Then the Senator speaks of "the misery and suffering" that follow economic pressure upon nations to make them keep the peace. Is not that amusing? The misery and suffering that would follow blockading somebody to make them keep the peace, to keep them, rather, from violating the covenants of peace, because it only applies to those who have taken the covenant upon their souls! How does that compare with the misery and suffering of the boys in the trenches and the mothers at home and the fathers seeking careers for the boys while they were suffering the hardships of the trenches and the horrors of gas attacks and the shattering of limb from limb by shrapnel and shell? Why should the Senator grow so pathetic about the suffering of nations visited with embargoes to make them keep their plighted word—that is all there is to it—and say so little about the horrors of war otherwise inescapable? Mr. President, war is the damned thing; it is the insane thing; it is the stupid and the foolish thing, and men who are not willing to do almost anything in the world except to sacrifice self-respect to get rid of it are unworthy of human notice. The Senator seems to have no indignation in his breast against war. He has never felt it.

Then the Senator scares us to death by telling us that the treaty might be "unconstitutional." Suppose it was; the Supreme Court would declare it to be unconstitutional just like it might declare any other law to be unconstitutional. Of course, it is my duty not to vote for a treaty that I think is unconstitutional; but suppose I thought it was constitutional, and suppose the Supreme Court of the United States thought it was not, the treaty would not be valid.

Then the Senator pays a high tribute to the idea that we "ought to remain disinterested." We remained disinterested in this war over a year longer than we ought to have remained disinterested. From the day that the Lusitania went to the bottom with its precious cargo of women and children we ought to have ceased to be disinterested.

The Senator appeals to "Americanism." My Americanism is not merely defensive; it is not merely a question of isolation; it is a question now and then of indignation and offense against the powers of unrighteousness and wrong, and I am willing to take up the cudgels against them. Then the Senator from Massachusetts finally shows the cloven hoof; he comes to the last political and party appeal and diapason of his magnificent address when he asks us "not to forget the millions of people of foreign birth and derivation in the United States" that perhaps we can not tie to ourselves nor to the American Republic. Oh, what does that mean? That means we must take account of the pro-German German-American vote and of the anti-British Irish vote, and that the politics of this country must be controlled by these hyphenated classes who confess their patriotism to be 50-50; at any rate, not 100 per cent American. I decline to consider any appeal made to me upon that ground. If there be any men in America whom, because of their "foreign derivation," as the Senator from Massachusetts calls it, we have got to nurse and hug and kiss in order to make them say that they are genuine Americans, I decline to hug or nurse or kiss them. So far as I am concerned they can go to the uttermost boundaries of Sheol and Sahara. I am going to favor the Government of this country regardless of men with 50-50 patriotism.

When any man comes to me telling me that he want this, that, or the other done because he is of German derivation and loves Germany I will say to him, "Then go back to Germany." If any man comes to me and says, "I want you to do this, that, or the other thing because I am an Irishman and hate Great Britain and I want to fight her," my answer is, "Go back, then, and fight her; do not call on me to do your fighting." If Great Britain should call on me to do her fighting against you, I would tell her—oh, well, I can not express in parliamentary language what I would tell her.

There is just this difference between these two classes of people. I have some respect—not much—for the German-American who opposes American policies because of "love for the Fatherland," but I have no respect at all for the man who opposes good American policies because of hatred of somebody in Europe. He has not even love behind his disloyalty; he has only hatred.

The Senator then said that "we owed no debt to anybody in the world except to France in our Revolution." Oh, I want to tell you about France—dear France; beautiful France. Do you know that the first act of our national existence was to enter into a treaty with France that we would defend her sovereignty and her territorial integrity in the West Indies—the very things you are quarreling about in this treaty—territorial integrity and sovereignty? The Continental Congress made that treaty, and after the new Federal Government was organized under the Constitution it reaffirmed the validity of all treaties which had been made including that; but when the time came around to defend the West India possessions of France, we coolly backed down; and we did it under no less a President than George Washington, and under no less a Secretary of State than Thomas Jefferson. It is a page of shame in American history, and yet it would have been a page of folly in American history if we had attempted to enforce the provision of the treaty, because we knew we could not. We had but a few ships while Great Britain had great fleets. There was no way in which we could practically defend the title and the sovereignty and the territorial integrity of France in the West Indies. But while Senators are talking about this league and talking about its being unconstitutional, let them not forget that a part of the consideration which we paid to France in order to gain our independence was that treaty, doing the very thing that Senators now say that in this treaty we can not constitutionally do.

Mr. BORAH. That we should not do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, no, you say that we can not do it; you say that it would be unconstitutional; you say it would deprive Congress of the right to declare war; you say it would deprive us of our sovereignty; you say it would be taking away from us our independence, if I understood the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Mississippi is in error.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If I am in error, I desire to be corrected.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Idaho has never taken that position.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then some other Senator did.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Idaho has never taken the position that by a treaty we can change the Constitution of the United States. I do not believe in any such doctrine.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not think anybody not an ass has ever taken that position except for the purposes of debate in the Senate; but that is not the point that I was getting at. Some Senators—and I thought the Senator from Idaho, amongst others—have contended that when we agree that we will protect with arms, if necessary, the territory of a foreign country we are trenching upon the right of Congress to declare war. As to the first treaty we ever made, a part of the consideration of the aid of France in gaining our independence was an engagement of just that sort. Whether we violated it or whether we kept it is a matter that sounds to our own honor or our own shame, but it does not sound to our right to enter into the treaty; and we entered into it, and it stands there not only as a precedent but as a birth principle.

But the Senator from Massachusetts says, "We owe no debt to anybody, except to France, for aid in the Revolution." Oh, Mr. President, I doubt that. We owe more debt than that to France. She saved civilization, or helped to save it, in this war in her fight against autocracy and barbarism and the old spirit—not of the Hun, because they were not descendants of the Hun, but of the Goth and Visigoth and the Vandal. She saved for the tenth time Latin civilization from Teutonic barbarism—once more in the history of the world she saved it. France helped save it; Great Britain helped save it; little Belgium helped save it. God knows we are under obligations to a whole lot of people besides France, and to France for much more and more recent than her services in the American Revolution.

It is true that we went in after a while at the right time, or about in the nick of time, at any rate—not quite the right time—and it is true that our soldiers did their part in magnificent style; but we did not win this war; we did not establish civilization over the inroads of the Vandal, the Goth, and the Visigoth. The whole world put together did it; the British and French and Belgian and Serbian and Italian had been standing there for three years before we got there. We are "under no obligations to anybody except France for helping us win our independence." We are under obligations to every man who served in the war with Germany and came out unscathed; we are under double obligations to every man who went in and came out without an arm or a leg, whether a Belgian, a Frenchman, or a Briton. We are under everlasting obligations to the shades and the ghosts of the dead of all three of those armies. It all marks one thing: We are under obligations to them and they are under obligations to us, and neither of us can do away with the obligations, and none of us can go back to the original isolation.

We can not go back to George Washington and the stagecoach and the horse-riding habit; we can not dispense with the fact that we have just tangled ourselves up in Europe; we can not dispense with the fact that we did not intend to tangle ourselves up in Europe. We just got tangled up because we could not help it. Senators speak of "entangling alliances." I tell you that what we propose are "unentangling" alliances. There can not be a war started in the Balkans to-morrow, there can not be a war started in Thrace to-morrow, there can not be a war started in Livonia to-morrow that will not sooner or later, under the present modern system of commerce and intercourse, bring the United States into it, in spite of the fact that we want to stay out of it. I remember how the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] was almost pathetically affected when he realized we had to go into the European war. It did not affect me in that way, because I had realized it a month or two before, but it did him; it came upon him all of a sudden. We could not keep out of it.

Now, what are you going to do? Are you going to leave our necessary "entanglement" to accident or are you going to direct your part in it? Are you going to drift or are you going to be partially, at any rate, "master of your own soul"? Are you going back to the conditions of 1914 and leave it to accident and incident and murder and mid-sea assassination to bring us in or are you going to say beforehand upon what grounds we are going in and upon what grounds we are going to stay out?

Talk about self-government, and talk about the United States controlling themselves, how are you going to let the United States control themselves by drifting along and leaving it all to accident under the old isolation idea, with an absolutely perfect knowledge that isolation as a fact has ceased to exist, as you must admit that it has? Are you going to guide your own destiny in advance by saying, "This thing and that thing and the other thing are just and right, and we shall abide by them, while this, that, and the other thing are wrong, unrighteous, and diabolical, and we will not tolerate them"? Or are you going to drift until shot at? By which one of these two plans do you make yourself most nearly "the architect of your own fortune"? By which one of them do you make yourself most "the captain of your own soul"—by drifting or by saying beforehand, in concert with civilized mankind, whither you are going?

The Senator from Massachusetts spoke of our being "in leading strings"; and yet he made a speech not long ago upon the floor of the Senate in which he accused the Senate and the Congress and the nations of Europe all of being in leading strings to Woodrow Wilson while he—Woodrow Wilson—was "obsessed" by the league of nations.

The Senator then referred contemptuously to "internationalism" with a side swipe at the Bolshevfsts, as if the so-called internationalism of Bolshevism had anything in the world to do with the internationalism of a world peace concert. He knows better; he knows that the right sort of internationalism is made up of treaties of peace between nations, each retaining its own sovereignty and surrendering nothing except by its own consent and giving its own consent only to provisions to secure world peace by the solemn assertion of the sovereignty of each nation obligating itself to that holy and sacred and Christlike purpose.

Mr. President, the Senator speaks of the Monroe doctrine. What the British delegate said about the Monroe doctrine was that it was "at first an American doctrine," and "it has become an international understanding." Is that not true in both particulars? In other words, they are now recognizing that which was solely an American doctrine as having grown to be an "international understanding," and they give their reasons for it. The world has obeyed it. Explicitly or implicitly, they have had "understanding" enough to mind it. But the Senator and others say to us: "Who is going to say whether or not the principles of the Monroe doctrine apply to a particular case?" That is the strong point in their argument, in which there is some merit. The answer to that is that, of course, nobody can be the sole judge in his own case; and when the treaty says that questions coming under the Monroe doctrine are excluded from the consideration of the league of peace the question will present itself whether or not a particular question does come under the Monroe doctrine or not; and when that question presents itself, of course, the other disputant has as much right as we have to raise the question and to have the civilized world sit in judgment upon it. But they can not decide against us except by a unanimous vote.

Mr. President, I want to apologize to the Senate for this so-called speech. I think it is a species of almost unutterable egotism for any human being to rise in his place in the Senate and attempt to answer extemporaneously a carefully, long-time prepared—lamplight-prepared—and written speech by the Senator from Massachusetts, in which he has probably weighed every word, weighed every comma and every period, with the view of avoiding criticism as far as could be, and with the view of helping the Republican Party all that he could with a careful, wise, taught, trained intellect, and with a great deal of information. I would not have undertaken to answer him at all to-day but for the fact that I did not want what he said to go into the RECORD, even for to-morrow, without something to show that somebody differed with him about the carefully drawn and midnight-light-finished periods of his speech. Later, on some day, I shall make a considered and careful reply, weighing words and phrases. That I could not do to-day, of course.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Mississippi has, perhaps, been a little oversevere in denouncing the Senator from Massachusetts——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not denounce him.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Because the Senator from Massachusetts elected to condemn the idea of a league of nations. Now, it is true that the Senator from Massachusetts did that to-day; but I hold in my hand an extract from a very able address of the Senator from Massachusetts——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Nebraska will pardon me for one interruption. I do not want it to appear that I denounced the Senator from Massachusetts. I may have denounced some of his utterances.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will accept that correction. I hold in my hand an extract from a most admirable defense of the idea of a league of nations which the Senator from Massachusetts denounced to-day, and I am sure that anyone reading the former address of the Senator from Massachusetts to which I refer and other addresses which he has made in support of the idea of a league of nations will make allowances for his attack upon the league of nations and his glorification of nationalism to-day.

Let me read an extract. It is from the speech made by the Senator from Massachusetts at Union College, I think, in 1915. He says:

> What can we do in the larger sense toward securing and maintaining the peace of the world? This is a much more difficult question; but turn it back and forth as we may there is no escape from the proposition that the peace of the world can only be maintained as the peace and order of a single community are maintained, as the peace of a single nation is maintained, by the force which united nations are willing to put behind the peace and order of the world. Nations must unite as men unite in order to preserve peace and order. The great nations must be so united as to be able to say to any single country, "You must not go to war"; and they can only say that effectively when the country desiring war knows that the force which the united nations place behind peace is irresistible. We have done something in advancing the settlement by arbitration of many minor questions which in former times led to wars and reprisals, although the points of difference were essentially insignificant, but as human nature is at present constituted and the world is at present managed there are certain questions which no nations would submit voluntarily to the arbitration of any tribunal, and the attempt to bring such questions within the jurisdiction of an arbitral tribunal not only fails in its purpose but discredits arbitration and the treaties by which the impossible is attempted. In differences between individuals the decision of the court is final, because in the last resort the entire force of the community is behind the court decision. In differences between nations which go beyond the limited range of arbitrable questions peace can only be maintained by putting behind it the force of united nations determined to uphold it and to prevent war. No one is more conscious than I of the enormous difficulties which beset such a solution or such a scheme, but I am certain that it is in this direction alone that we can find hope for the maintenance of the world's peace and the avoidance of needless wars. Even if we could establish such a union of nations there might be some wars which could not be avoided, but there are certainly many which might be prevented.
> It might be easily said that this idea, which is not a new one, is impracticable; but it is better than the idea that war can be stopped by language, by speechmaking, by vain agreements, which no one would carry out when the stress came, by denunciations of war and laudations of peace, in which all men agree, for these methods are not only impracticable but impossible and barren of all hope of real result. It may seem Utopian at this moment to suggest a union of civilized nations in order to put a controlling force behind the maintenance of peace and international order; but it is through the aspiration for perfection, through the search for Utopias, that the real advances have been made. At all events, it is along this path that we must travel if we are to attain in any measure to the end we all desire of peace upon earth. It is at least a great, a humane purpose to which, in these days of death and suffering, of misery, and sorrow among so large a portion of mankind, we might well dedicate ourselves. We must begin the work with the clear understanding that our efforts will fail if they are tainted with the thought of personal or political profit or with any idea of self-interest or self-glorification. We may not now succeed, but I believe that in the slow process of the years others who come after us will reach the goal. The effort and the sacrifice which we make will not be in vain when the end in sight is noble, when we are striving to help mankind and lift the heaviest of burdens from suffering humanity.

So, Mr. President, it appears that the Senator from Massachusetts knows how to advocate a league of nations. It appears that the Senator from Massachusetts believed in a league of nations a few years ago, and it is for the Senator from Massachusetts to explain why he now devotes his speech to denouncing the league of nations and glorifying nationalism. [Applause in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is inclined to say a word to the occupants of the galleries.

There is a rule of the Senate that there shall be neither approval nor disapproval from the galleries. In recent months you have paid no attention to the rules. You are simply there as the guests of the Senate. To-day we had a shocking spectacle of hissing from the galleries of the United States Senate. This body is supposed to be composed of men who can utter their views fearlessly upon any public question without being awed and intimidated by those who for the moment happen to be guests in the galleries. The Chair thought a reasonable amount of applause was pleasing to a speaker. The Chair has never reached the conclusion that to be hissed is pleasing to any man.

The Chair hopes it will not be necessary to be constantly calling the attention of the occupants of the galleries to the rule of the Senate. I am not responsible for it. I did not make it. So far as I am concerned, you can cheer all you want to and throw all the stale vegetables you want to. It would not hurt me; but it is a rule of the Senate and I am ordered to enforce it.

I hope those who come to the galleries hereafter will be kind enough to obey the proprieties and the rules as laid down.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I remained silent during the discussion by the able Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], not expecting to take any part in the debate, but in view of some observations that he made with reference to my position, I desire to occupy the time of the Senate a moment. Before I say what I desire to say in reply to the Senator from Mississippi, with regard to his reference to myself, may I say a word with reference to the rereading of the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], delivered some three or four years ago at some college graduating exercises, I believe?

I am fairly familiar with that speech as I have heard it read several times here in the Senate. I only stop to say that if there be inconsistency between the position of the Senator from Massachusetts at this time and the position which he occupied at that time, great men often change their views. I have in my desk—which I am not going to take the time to read—perhaps the most brilliant defense that has been made in America of late years of the policy of isolation, so called, and of the maintenance of Washington's policy and of the Monroe doctrine, a defense made four years ago by the President of the United States. He stated, with his usual capacity for expression, that our great object was to maintain a situation wherein America could live her own life. I do not quote his exact language, but he contended with great earnestness that we should keep out of all entangling alliances with European powers. With force and clearness, with fullness and breadth, he covered and defended the nonentangling policy as the only true and safe policy for this Republic.

I get no particular benefit out of the proposition that the President has changed his view. It neither adds to nor takes from my view with reference to this league. But if the debate in this Chamber is to turn upon the question of the consistency of our leaders, and if we are to be required to follow them in their meanderings across the intellectual field, I pass over to the Senator from Nebraska the address of the President of the United States four years ago, and as the President can not address the Senate from the floor I ask the Senator from Nebraska to explain the President's address.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho will appreciate that I was defending the Senator from Massachusetts against the charge brought by the Senator from Mississippi. I was showing that he did hold other views, but he expressed them at a different time.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am defending the President in the same way. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any possibility of the occupants of the galleries being at least courteous to the presiding officer of this body? Is it to become absolutely necessary to close the doors of the Senate of the United States to keep visitors out? There ought to be at least some gentlemanly conduct on the part of people who occupy the galleries.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I agree entirely with the views of the President of the United States as expressed four years ago. I have never for a moment other than defended those views, not so ably as the President presented them, not so comprehensively and effectively, but in my humble way following undeviatingly the policy announced by the President at that time.

Again, before the President left for Europe the first time he stated that no special alliance could ever have the approval of the United States. He stated that which is true, and which all history supports, that special alliances are the sources of war, that they are the means by which wars are engendered, and that the United States could never be interested in special alliances. Others even more familiar with the President's speeches will have no trouble in recalling his clear and ringing denunciation of these alliances. They were to be forever rejected and once for all condemned.

After the President went to Europe, Mr. Clemenceau made a statement to the effect that France would be satisfied with nothing less than the old balance of power, which was rather a shock to the world at that time, because the world generally agreed with Mr. Wilson's statement that the balance of power was simply a means of engendering and perpetuating this world strife in which Europe had been engaged for 300 years. The President promptly and effectively replied to Mr. Clemenceau the next day, if I remember correctly as to dates, at Manchester, England, saying that if the United States was to be invited into the old system of balance of power, to engage in special alliances, the United States would find no interest in the suggested program.

Nevertheless, Mr. President, the circumstances were such—and I am frank to say that I do not know what all the circumstances were—that special alliances were made, they were negotiated, and they are now here for ratification by the Senate of the United States. The old balance of power comes stalking in upon us again, with only this difference from the balance of power that existed for 300 years, that the American Republic is to become a part of it, a member of it. All this now has the blessing and the support of the President.

So I say, Mr. President, that this question of the consistency or inconsistency of leaders has, to my mind, very little weight in determining whether or not this particular league which is now submitted to us is a wise thing for us to join. It rests upon principles so fundamental and so wide-reaching and extending so far in the future that any one man's opinion is worth very little more than another man's opinion; and a man's opinion to-day may, indeed, by course of events, be changed to-morrow. The most that we can do is to examine the league according to its terms and in conscientious devotion to our own country determine as best we may where duty lies and where obligation calls us to go.

Passing upon this league in that respect, as the Senate well knows, my views were expressed upon it some two years ago. I do not claim that by reason of any ability of mine I was at that time able to outline a course which I have been able to follow since, but I was able, by reason of the information which I gathered from the lives of those who had proven their worth to mankind and their wisdom, to determine upon a course from which I have not deviated, and, God being my help, I am not going to deviate from it for any possible reason that can be suggested in this Senate Chamber or any influence that can be exerted elsewhere. I do not say this because I rely upon my own judgment in the matter, but when I gather together in my mind's vision that body of men, coming down from Washington, and Jefferson, and Madison, and Monroe, and Jackson, and Lincoln, and Grant, and McKinley, and Roosevelt, and Wilson until four years ago, I reach the conclusion that I must remain in that company. Where in all the annals of Government do you find such another group of men—men so distinguished for wisdom, for courage, for patriotism; men whose policies have been so amply and conclusively justified by the severest of all tests, that of experience? Their company is safe enough for me, and it is the only safe company that I know of in this great emergency and in this great crisis in which we find ourselves. I believe, if I might suggest it to my colleagues, it would be found pretty good company in which to keep close association for the future.

We are told, Mr. President, that the policy of Washington was framed under circumstances and conditions wholly different from the present. I challenge the statement upon the facts. Washington's policy was framed under conditions almost exactly the same as conditions which prevailed at the close of this war. War had been raging in Europe for 20 years. Every part and parcel of Europe was torn with turmoil and strife and dissension, with dynastic quarrels and racial antipathies. It had extended over a greater territory even than the present war. Spain, Portugal, Norway, Sweden, and Switzerland—all those countries—had been swept into it. Chaos reigned throughout Christendom. The storm of battle had swept every coast and visited all lands. We ourselves had just emerged from the European system. We had been a part of it as colonies for 200 years, and the thought of the entire world was that the only safe course was for the new United States to ally itself with European powers. It was deemed essential to our safety and security that we join with European powers in establishing a stable civilization, and the appeal which was made to the Father of his Country could be very easily duplicated to-day by taking the language then used and applying it to the arguments which are now made.

He was asked if it was thought that the United States could travel alone in a world of turmoil and strife, in a world of dissension and disorder. He was asked if it was believed that we could establish here a system or a civilization of our own and maintain it against the ever-encroaching powers of European governments. A less steadfast soul would have yielded. But he sat upon his back porch at his home at Mount Vernon and fought it out. He there dictated the first letter upon the subject, even before he was elected President of the United States, and said there was only one way by which to build a nation, to have common ideals, common aspirations, a common purpose, a national mind, and a national purpose, and that was to divorce and separate ourselves from the European system. It was a wise course. It saved and made possible this Republic. And I am one of those who believe that in that hour he was guided by a wisdom higher than all earthly wisdom. So the little American Republic, thirteen colonies, without an army and without a navy, launched out upon an unknown sea, without any other chart or compass than that of the faith of the Father of his Country, and to-day we have here, as a monument to his genius and his statesmanship, the most powerful Nation on the face of God's footstool. Without his foreign policy this effort would have ended in failure. Without its faithful maintenance, it is my belief, this glorious enterprise would be dragged down by Europe to disaster and ruin.

It was my faith in these leaders which led me. The Senator from Mississippi is exactly correct. I go back 100 years and plant my feet upon the principles upon which this Republic was founded. I want no league. You can not have a league without compromising these two great propositions. How can you have a league without surrendering and forfeiting Washington's policy? The very first thing that you do with reference to the league is to form your permanent alliances with European powers, and Washington's policy is gone. Is there any man who believes for a moment that you can maintain the Monroe doctrine when Washington's policy is gone? If we intermeddle in European affairs, Europe will intermeddle in our affairs. You can put it upon paper, you can write it in black and white, but the practical course of events will carry us together. There is one thing, Mr. President, which this league does beyond all controversy—about that there can be no dispute—it may not mean peace, it may mean war; it may mean this or it may mean that, but there can be no possible question that it sacrifices for all time both these great policies. For that reason, so far as I am concerned, I accept the position which the Senator from Mississippi assigns to me, and I go back 100 years and plant myself upon those principles.

Mr. President, there are some things about which there can be no compromise and concerning which there can be no respectable halfway ground. One of those things is the integrity of your country's independence. Who would debate the question of personal honor? Who would formulate reservations concerning the sacred unity of the family? And who will urge that our country shall be satisfied with anything less than untrammeled and absolute independence? Who will contend that any part, however small, of the power of the people of this country to choose our policy and shape our course shall be shared with foreigners?

There are spheres of action in which compromise may be a wise rule. In the ordinary concerns of life in our national domestic affairs concessions and expediency may have their proper place, but in the great and sacred things of individual and national life those things which stand for conscience, for personal honor, for family, for national independence, for the freedom of a people, compromise is degradation and concession is ruin.

We are told that God made of one blood all nations of men to dwell upon all the face of the earth. Recognizing that fact, we are in duty bound as a Christian Nation to be sympathetic and helpful, to be fair and honest and just, toward all peoples and nations.

Mr. THOMAS. My recollection of that scriptural quotation is that the Senator stated only a part of it.

Mr. BORAH. I am going to state the rest. But we are also advised, as the Senator from Colorado was about to suggest, I presume, that while He made of one blood all nations of men to dwell upon the face of the earth, He marked the bounds of their habitations. He divided them into peoples and nations, confounding their tongues, and distinguishing their colors and customs. Recognizing that fact also, shall we not nourish and cherish our national spirit, augment and strengthen our national ideals, and if we wish to preserve our individual civilization, shall we not guard with relentless vigilance our national independence untrammeled and disenthralled?

Great and noble institutions have been given into our keeping for a brief season, policies which have given us prestige and power and honor are now intrusted through the accidents of time and politics to our honor and to our courage—and as for me, I shall vote to pass them on as they came into our possession—the richest heritage ever left to the care of any generation of men. If they are to be compromised, if they are to be surrendered in whole or in part, if they are to be any less effective, less potent for the happiness and tranquillity, the honor, and the glory of America in the future than they have been in the past, it will be by other votes than mine.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I will not attempt to add to what has just been said by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], nor to suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] anything that might be an addition to what has been so eloquently said by him to-day; but as a contribution historically to the discussion I want to read a portion of a letter of Secretary of State Adams to the American ambassador on the occasion when the United States of America was invited to become a part of the Holy Alliance. The language then used is apt to-day. The result of the Holy Alliance has been portrayed in a fashion which I could not equal and which I would not attempt to emulate; but the fact is that the Senator from Massachusetts is everlastingly right when he asserts that, under article 10 of the covenant which is sought to be foisted upon this Nation, not alone will external aggression be under the jurisdiction of this league but every internal disturbance which might threaten external aggression will alike be under the jurisdiction of the league and will alike be dealt with by the league.

I read the letter of Secretary Adams because of its singular aptness in this particular juncture and because I think that heretofore it has not been made a part of the record. I read only a part of it. The whole may be found in Moore's International Law, if any colleague desires there to investigate:

> The political system of the United States is also essentially extra-European. To stand in firm and cautious independence of all entanglement in the European system has been a cardinal point of their policy under every administration of their Government, from the peace of 1783 to this day. If at the original adoption of their system there could have been any doubt of its justice or its wisdom, there can be none at this time. Every year's experience rivets it more deeply in the principles and opinions of the Nation. Yet, in proportion as the importance of the United States as one of the members of the general society of civilized nations increases in the eyes of the others, the difficulties of maintaining this system and the temptations to depart from it increase and multiply with it. The Russian Government has not only manifested an inclination that the United States should concur in the general principles of the European league, but a direct though unofficial application has been made by the present Russian minister here that the United States should become formal parties to the Holy Alliance. It has been suggested, as inducement to obtain their compliance, that this compact bound the parties to no specific engagement of anything.

How like that is to some of the arguments which are advanced by our league of nation's men to-day!

> That it was a pledge of mere principles—that its real as well as its professed purpose was merely the general preservation of peace—and it was intimated that if any question should arise between the United States and other Governments of Europe, the Emperor Alexander, desirous of using his influence in their favor, would have a substantial motive and justification for interposing if he could regard them as his allies, which, as parties to the Holy Alliance, he would.
> It is possible that overtures of a similar character may be made to you; but whether they should be or not it is proper to apprise you of the light in which they have been viewed by the President. No direct refusal has been signified to Mr. Poletica. It is presumed that none will be necessary. His instructions are not to make the proposal in form unless with a prospect that it will be successful. It might, perhaps, be sufficient to answer that the organization of our Government is such as not to admit of our acceding formally to that compact. But it may be added that the President, approving its general principles and thoroughly convinced of the benevolent and virtuous motives which led to the conception and presided at the formation of this system by the Emperor Alexander, believes that the United States will more effectually contribute to the great and sublime objects for which it was concluded by abstaining from a formal participation in it than they could as stipulated members of it. As a general declaration of principles, disclaiming the impulses of vulgar ambition and unprincipled aggrandizement and openly proclaiming the peculiarly Christian maxims of mutual benevolence and brotherly love to be binding upon the intercourse between nations no less than upon that of individuals, the United States not only give their hearty assent to the articles of the Holy Alliance but will be among the most earnest and conscientious in observing them. But independent of the prejudices which have been excited against this instrument in the public opinion, which time and an experience of its good effects will gradually wear away, it may be observed that for the repose of Europe as well as of America, the European and American political system should be kept as separate and distinct from each other as possible. If the United States as members of the Holy Alliance could acquire a right to ask the influence of its most powerful member in their controversies with other States, the other members must be entitled in return to ask the influence of the United States for themselves or against their opponents; in the deliberations of the league they would be entitled to a voice, and in exercising their right must occasionally appeal to principles which might not harmonize with those of any European member of the bond. This consideration alone would be decisive for declining a participation in that league, which is the President's absolute and irrevocable determination, although he trusts that no occasion will present itself rendering it necessary to make that determination known by an explicit refusal.

This was a letter of Mr. Adams, Secretary of State, to Mr. Middleton, minister to Russia, July 5, 1820, and what he said there is true to-day. What was stated there as to the ability of the United States better to aid the benevolent purposes of the Holy Alliance is true to-day, and the greatest asset the peace of the world has, the United States, will be sacrificed by the United States joining any league wherein its action will be curtailed or wherein it will be subject to any foreign nation.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. J. Res. 150) to suspend the requirements of annual assessment work on certain mining claims during the year 1919, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MOSES presented petitions of the congregation of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Chesterfield and of sundry citizens of Raymond, Mason, Hopkinton, and Albany, all in the State of New Hampshire, praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PAGE presented a memorial of Mansfield Grange, No. 441, Patrons of Husbandry, of Jericho, Vt., remonstrating against the adoption of the proposed plan of the Secretary of the Interior to reclaim desert and swamp lands, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of Local Union No. 338, Amalgamated Sheet Metal Workers' International Alliances, of Hanford, Calif., praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of Orange Grove Lodge, No. 97, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, of Los Angeles, Calif., praying for Government ownership and control of railroads for a period of five years, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED.

A bill and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. OWEN:

A bill (S. 2767) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, as amended by the acts of August 4, 1914, August 15, 1914, March 3, 1915, September 7, 1916, and June 21, 1917; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. POMERENE:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 86) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan necessary cots, blankets, and equipment for use at the encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, to be held in Columbus, Ohio, during September, 1919; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WALSH of Montana:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 87) authorizing the President to distribute food supplies to drought-stricken territory; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. OWEN:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 88) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to supervise the issuance of securities, and for other purposes"; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

OIL AND GAS LANDS.

Mr. MYERS submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1269) to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain, which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed.

HIGH COST OF LIVING.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, a day or two ago I received from a correspondent a letter calling my attention to what he claimed to be the effect of the existing revenue law upon the high cost of living. The argument which he presents, while not entirely convincing, is very important, and I am sure will be an interesting one to the Senate. I ask leave therefore to have the letter inserted in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"NEW YORK, August 5, 1919.

"Hon. C. S. THOMAS,
"249 Senate Office Building,
"Washington, D. C.

"MY DEAR SIR: I have been reading the newspapers with much interest on the subject of the high cost of living. Every one so far has missed what to me is one of the most potent influences in that direction if not the most potent of all. That is the system of taxation. I am convinced that courageous tax revision in the right direction will do more good than any one thing and of itself would yank present costs of necessities down by 20 to 30 per cent. I refer to direct consumption taxes instead of excess-profits taxes. The individual income tax I don't think has much effect.

"The excess and war profits tax is on the wrong end—the producing instead of the consuming end. The manufacturer figures—and not unjustly—that he should have the same net profit after taxes now as he had five years ago, so he adds to his selling price sufficient to pay his excess-profits tax to get this result, and in most cases adds a bit for good luck. The jobber he sells to probably is incorporated and has to pay an excess-profits tax, so he adds in the same way. He may sell to a smaller distributer who does likewise; then along comes the retailer, and he does it too—to pay his excess-profits tax, if incorporated, and his income tax if not. So the consumer really pays a tax on a tax on a tax on a tax, and a profit on each tax. If the tax was assessed against the sale to the consumer or against the sales of the retailer, the same sum in revenue from taxes could be raised and still deliver the article to the consumer for much less than now. It is easy to multiply cases proving this. I would retain the excess-profits tax only as a tax on earnings in excess of prewar earnings, taxing such excess earnings 100 per cent, if possible, allowing, however, tax-free earnings on additional capital in the same proportion as on prewar capital.

"New enterprises could be taxed on excess earnings by allowing them the same tax-free earnings as business in similar lines. You might add an administrative provision that for purposes of figuring earnings for taxation that salaries of officers could be no greater than for the prewar period, plus a proportion equal to the ratio of the index figure for basic commodity prices of necessities for the particular year to the same index for the prewar period. A few such provisions would avoid salary padding, etc., to figure down earnings.

"I don't think it would be difficult to convince the wage earner that capital would not benefit financially from this, but that he would, as he pays the tax anyway. I think such a plan would reduce costs materially. Limitation of hoarding, etc., will help, but taxation will strike right at the root of it."

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON BUDGET SYSTEM.

On motion of Mr. LODGE, it was—

Ordered, That in compliance with the Senate resolution of the 14th instant, Mr. MCCORMICK, Mr. SMOOT, Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. LENROOT, Mr. EDGE, Mr. KEYES, Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. JONES of New Mexico, Mr. WOLCOTT, and Mr. KING be constituted the special committee to consider plans for a budget system.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, August 13, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate August 12, 1919.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, August 12, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, lead us by Thy wisdom out of the labyrinth of confused thought and purpose in which we find ourselves as a people into the pure light of heaven, that we may see our way clearly, walk humbly before Thee fulfilling the genius of our Republic, making life worth living—class conditions and circumstances, birth and inherited wealth, to the contrary notwithstanding.

We thank Thee that this Capital City will give a royal welcome to the marines who proved themselves Americans by their valor, bravery, and endurance in the greatest battle of the late war, that we may show our appreciation, love for our country, in this day of glory; and Thine be the praise, through Him who taught us the way, and the truth, and the life. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, August 9, 1919, was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. IGOE, for one week, on account of death in family.

To Mr. STEDMAN, indefinitely, on account of important business.

RECESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the Capital City is to-day doing honor to the men who turned the tide of war at Chateau-Thierry and Belleau Woods. [Applause.] I ask unanimous consent that the House stand in recess for one hour——

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Why not adjourn?

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, if we want to see the parade, we can not do it in one hour. It will be two hours before that is over. I think we can easily adjourn.

Mr. MONDELL. In view of the evident opinion that we should stand in recess more than one hour, I ask unanimous consent that the House stand in recess until 2 o'clock in honor of the heroic members of the Fourth Brigade of Marines and their gallant commander, Col. Neville.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming that the House stand in recess until 2 o'clock p. m.? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House stood in recess until 2 o'clock p. m.

AFTER THE RECESS.

The recess having expired, at 2 o'clock p. m. the House was called to order by the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Under the previous order of the House, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I asked for time to discuss the high cost of living largely because our mails are filled with inquiries upon this subject and many various suggestions are given as a remedy. I hold here a list of the letters coming from men of distinction, some of them governors of States, others business men, all of them recognizing a condition that is very abnormal, and many of them making specific suggestions or offering remedies that ought to be applied.

I asked especially for time to discuss one phase of the high cost of living that has not been fully discussed in this House; at least I have not noticed very elaborate discussion of it anywhere. I refer to the inflation of the currency and the inflation of our credits. That was what I had in mind when I asked for time, but when I entered upon the subject I found so many phases of it that I shall not be able to get through in 20 minutes, and I now ask that I be not interrupted, at least until the 20 minutes are exhausted.

Mr. Speaker, the Government must take action on the following items:

1. Take immediate steps to increase the purchasing power of the dollar.
2. Control the export of foodstuffs, even to the point of an embargo if necessary.
3. Get out of Europe bag and baggage as soon as possible.
4. Dismantle immediately the war machine and repeal the war-emergency legislation, so as to get back to a peace basis.
5. Eliminate every item of needless waste, cut off every unnecessary agency induced by war, and reduce the national pay roll to prewar times as soon as possible.
6. Dispose of the vast stores of war materials both in Europe and in this country on the best salvage basis and to the best advantage of the public at large by opening sales direct with the public.
7. Inaugurate a campaign of "work and saving" against the baneful extravagance so widely prevalent.
8. The Government must get out of business at the earliest possible day, but, if necessary, exercise a regulatory control of transportation under private enterprise, that economy and efficiency may be assured without the danger of advantage being taken of the public.
9. All profiteering must be punished to the limit.

The Government must employ its abundant authorities to do this, and wherever it appears more authority should be granted it will be granted immediately.

The activities of the Department of Justice indicate abundant authority to prosecute profiteers.

The Hutchinson bill, introduced several days before the President's appearance and following a general demand from the House that greater control of cold storage be exercised, is now before the Committee on Agriculture.

A famous Englishman a few days ago, commenting upon the high cost of living, remarked: "President Wilson has not yet written a note about it. But American labor has asked him whether the rise in prices is due to profiteering or exportation. When he does write a note he will likely say that it is due most largely to an over-plus of circulation."

When the President addressed us he took the popular view and laid the cause to profiteering, and asked for more law to prevent it. If the price is being controlled by wanton destruction, through neglect or otherwise, section 8 of the food-control act, August 10, 1917, will prevent it if enforced:

Any person who willfully destroys any necessaries for the purpose of enhancing the price or restricting the supply thereof shall upon conviction thereof be fined not exceeding $5,000 or imprisoned for not more than two years, or both.

If the price is controlled by any combination to restrict either supply or distribution, section 9, of same law, on a penalty of $10,000 or imprisonment for two years, or both, will prevent it if enforced:

SEC. 9. That any person who conspires, combines, agrees, or arranges with any other person (a) to limit the facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing, or dealing in any necessaries; (b) to restrict the supply of any necessaries; (c) to restrict the distribution of any necessaries; (d) to prevent, limit, or lessen the manufacture or production of any necessaries in order to enhance the price thereof shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not exceeding $10,000 or be imprisoned for not more than two years, or both.

If the price is the result of storing or holding for the purpose of limiting the supply to the public or affecting the price, it can be punished with a penalty of $5,000 or imprisonment of two years, or both, under section 26 of the same law.

If the high cost of foods, feeds, fuel, or any necessaries of life is due to a cornering process by the profiteer it can be punished under the Sherman antitrust law, which seems to have become lifeless in recent years, but is still the law.

The law permits the President to purchase, store, hold, and sell foods as a measure to control the production, distribution, and price to the consumer. In the exercise of such power the War Department held vast stores of foods after the armistice, primarily to keep up the price, until ordered by a vote of this House to dispose of it directly to the public, but not until after great loss, the amount of which no one will likely ever know—loss by sheer negligence to dispose of it.

In 1913 President Wilson commented upon the high cost of living as follows:

One of the most significant signs of the new social era is the degree to which government has become associated with business. I speak for the moment of the control over the Government exercised by big business. * * * Our Government has been for the past few years under the control of heads of great allied corporations with special interests. It has not controlled these special interests and assigned them a proper place in the whole system of business; it has submitted itself to their control.

Whatever be the basis of this statement in 1913 he has been our President ever since with all the law in his hands and has been given absolute and war power to control, and yet no period in our history shows such a range of cost as to-day.

The President's suggestion of more law is not tenable until he enforces the law now on the books. He has all the law necessary to prosecute the profiteer. The appropriations of the past years were available, and those for the next fiscal year were made less than a month ago, and that money is now available. The only thing necessary is to use the authority he now has to enforce the law. The activities now observed of the various departments, including the Department of Justice, clearly show that the failure is not want of law but lack of enforcement incident to an itinerary government, too much engaged in European duties to look after American affairs.

Mr. Speaker, while the high cost of living is due to the wasteful methods of war and which can only be relieved by a discontinuance of these governmental methods, there are at least two fundamental items which must not be overlooked in an examination of the high level of cost of production, first, the governmental increase in wages, the chief item of cost in production, and, second, the cheapening of the purchasing power of our money through a vast inflation of both credit and currency.

The wages paid in any industry is determined by what the market will stand. If the price is more than the market will support, wages must come down or the business must stop, in which case there is neither work nor wages. But in the case of war activities, the Government becomes the employer of labor and the market does not determine the scale, since the product is not sold but used by the Government; hence cost counts but little since the Government Treasury supplies the payment.

The country suddenly went to a war basis. It called labor in great masses at unheard-of wages into building cantonments, aviation fields, munition plants, shipyards, and numerous other activities sufficient to fix the scale for all the country, both war and peace industries.

It drained all the country of its labor. The peace industries which were not closed were compelled to meet the Government in its competition for labor or close down altogether. This was done, and the Government's scale of wages became the general scale for all industries not closed, and the additional cost was passed on to the public.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the gentleman willing to pay the ordinary laborers of this country the same salaries that our Supreme Court judges get, the same salaries that a United States Senator and a Representative get, the same income that an expert physician receives for his services? That is the contention they are making upon the Congressmen of the country in many of the letters that I am receiving—that, ipso facto, because a Congressman gets $7,500 a year, the ordinary laborer should receive that much.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman's question carries with it its own answer. The gentleman knows that I do not believe in that sort of an idea.

Mr. BLANTON. That is the sort of question which you will be called upon to decide.

Mr. FESS. I believe that the laborer should be paid in accordance with the efficiency of the service rendered, and I see clearly that in this abnormal level of prices wages can not come down until the cost of living comes down. However, I want to go into that a little further on and a little more fully. I am now speaking of the Government's part in increasing the cost of living by offering unheard of wages for all sorts of labor on contracts on "cost plus" basis, which was the most persuasive reason for increasing cost instead of decreasing it. There is no other conceivable way to insure greater waste of Government funds than the methods employed deliberately by this administration.

It is well known that the Government doubled and trebled in places wages, greatly increased the number of laborers in a given work, fixed eight hours for a day with time and a half for overtime, paid transportation for its labor, including time en route, and in many cases built houses for its labor.

What was done in war activities in a lesser degree was done in the transportation business. The first step after the Government took over the roads was to increase wages to a point where the second greatest business of the world—up to that time a prosperous enterprise giving the best service and at the least burden upon the public known to the world—at once faced bankruptcy, which was obviated only because of the Federal Treasury, and yet costing the public for transportation service—the most unsatisfactory known to the country—the highest rates in railway history.

This is but one object lesson of the business capacity of the Government and its part in the increased cost of living. It can be repeated wherever the Government has entered the business realm. Politics can not take the place of efficiency.

Take the telephone business. I installed a telephone in my house since the Government took over the telephones, and before we returned them I was required to pay $5 for the installation, a thing I never was called upon to do before the Government mixed up the telephone business. I had occasion to move the phone from one side of the room to the other because I found it was wrongly placed. I asked that it be done; it was done and I was again presented with an additional bill of $3.50 for transferring the telephone. Now, that useless governmental wicked waste displayed in all the Government operations is passed on to the public, and it is that feature which the Government does in everything it touches that accounts largely for the high level of cost as expressed in the cost of living.

A further sidelight upon transportation facilities is the bankruptcy of trolley lines, the interruption of transporting articles of commerce to the centers, and the consequent suffering in the midst of plenty, by prohibitive prices, through the inability to make connection between producer and consumer. Less governmental interference with rates and greater latitude for enterprise are demanded.

Perhaps the most glaring example of labor profiteering is in the case of Hog Island, too well known to need comment. This was not only allowed but invited by the Government.

We can not reduce the cost of labor, and should not, so long as the price of living remains where it is. While it is the chief item of cost, it never increases as rapidly as the cost of living, as demonstrated by the figures compiled by the Labor Department.

INFLATION OF CURRENCY AND CREDIT.

A second chief item in the high cost level is the inflation of our currency, and especially our credits, which has cheapened the purchasing power of the dollar, which will not to-day purchase half what it commanded prior to the war.

The estimate is that wages increased about 42 per cent on the average, but the cost of living has gone in certain agricultural products from 88 per cent to 103 per cent. The cost of living can not be so easily controlled as the wages of the great masses of laboring men, and, consequently, if there is an increased level of prices very largely initiated by governmental stimulation on the side of increase of labor, other things take advantage of it and go way beyond, and labor is the sufferer after all.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have 10 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman permit one other question?

Mr. FESS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman spoke of extravagance, and that there must be a change, and I heartily agree with him. Does the gentleman think that the ladies, in August, should quit wearing—especially poor shop girls—$100 furs; and I would like to ask the gentleman whether he is in favor of their wearing furs on bathing garters and things of that kind?

Mr. FESS. I will say to my friend he is getting into a realm I fear law will not help. [Applause.]

A committee of 12 on war finance, appointed by the American Economic Association, representing the best thought in America, reported this year its findings, including the item of inflation. Inflation is a redundancy of currency beyond trade needs. It occurs when, at a given price level, the circulating medium increases beyond the needs of trade. War inevitably produces inflation, as it invariably stimulates trade by entering upon borrowing as a basis of transaction. The present war stimulated American enterprise before we entered the war.

This committee took 12 items of trade: Pig iron, anthracite coal, bituminous coal, petroleum, copper, silver, rail transportation, water transportation of freight, wheat, corn, and cotton, and building permits in given cities. These 12 activities include the stable occupations and represent fairly the business of the country.

Beginning with 1913 as the basis, at 100 per cent, the physical volume of business up to the armistice was as follows: Nineteen hundred and thirteen, 100 per cent; 1914, 99 per cent; 1915, 103 per cent; 1916, 107 per cent; 1917, 112 per cent. Nineteen hundred and eighteen was not given, but it is safe to say it was at least 115 per cent. This shows that the increase of volume of business was at least 15 per cent.

The money in circulation for our purpose will only include what is in actual circulation, and will not, therefore, include what is held in the Federal Treasury, nor that held by the reserve banks and agents as reserve against outstanding reserve notes. Taking the same years, we have:

Years.	Amount.	Per cent.
1913	$3,390,000,000	100
1914	3,505,000,000	103
1915	3,682,000,000	109
1916	4,159,000,000	123
1917	4,914,000,000	145
1918	5,428,000,000	160

While the volume of business calling for money use increased but 15 per cent in 1918 over 1913, the circulation increased 60 per cent. This alone will indicate the effect upon price.

Then, in addition, the stock of gold in the country, which in 1913 was but $1,885,000,000, rose in 1918 to $3,066,000,000, or nearly 80 per cent increase. Here the basic money must respond to the law of supply and demand.

The total stock of money in the country in 1913 was $3,732,000,000; in 1917, $5,661,000,000; and in 1918, $6,848,000,000. If we take the day's report from the Treasury, we will note that the present stock of money will reach close to $7,000,000,000.

The measure of inflation is not the 60 per cent of increase of money in circulation, nor the 83 per cent of money stock in the country. It is found, in addition to these items, in the deposit currency which under the present Treasury financing by short-term certificates which had reached since we entered the war considerably over $20,000,000,000 in addition to the vast bank deposits against which checks could be drawn. This, taken in connection with the deposit currency upon which checks were issued, which ranges from 75 to 90 per cent of business, reaches into yet higher figures. While the per capita stock of money reaches nearly $70, that does not represent the inflation now experienced.

The bank clearings outside of the reserve banks reach over $300,000,000,000 in a year. The Federal Reserve System also permits the reserve money greater use, so that to-day 10.6 cents (106 mills) in bank does a dollar's worth of work if measured by actual checking. This is an increase over 1913 of 9.4 per cent.

This vast inflation, first in our currency, which is easily 60 per cent, and secondly in our money stock, which reaches over 80 per cent, and lastly in the deposit currency, which no one can tell accurately, goes far to explain the abnormal prices for everything purchased and measured in this inflated period. At the close of the Civil War our per capita circulation was $16.50. In the famous silver campaign of 1896 it was about $30. While nominally, according to Gov. Harding's figures, it is to-day less than $50, it really reaches nearer $70 in money, to say nothing of deposit currency.

It is as bad as it was in the greenback period following the Civil War. The years immediately following the close of the Civil War supply a period in our history which all should reread. The remedy came, after bitter debate and business disaster, in the resumption of specie payment.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman's time may be extended two minutes. I desire to ask him some questions.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have 10 minutes more. I find I will not be able to get through.

Mr. GARNER. I understood the gentleman did not want to be interrupted until he concluded his remarks, and that is the reason I did not interrupt him.

Mr. FESS. I will finish with this branch of the subject in a few minutes and then yield to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to speak for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FESS. I will yield to my friend from Texas in just a moment.

The remedy now is not that, since specie itself has become a drug on the market. It must be by a wise policy of gradual retirement of a redundant currency, which is the inevitable effect of the ease with which the Treasury attempts to convert fictitious values into liquid assets. The boast of the reserve system is rapidly becoming the undoing of our entire industrial fabric, in which a remedy is becoming a disease. The country must find a way to reach normal by gradual process, or it will be reached after a crash not unlike that of 1873, which is an assured result of an era of wild speculation. No legislation is necessary to apply the remedy unless authority refuses to do it, when legislative direction may be necessary.

Now, I will yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I gathered from the early remarks of the gentleman from Ohio that his position, and I take it the position on that side of the House, will be that there are no laws necessary in response to the President's message in order to reduce the cost of living, because, if I understood the gentleman, he contends that the laws on the statute books now are sufficient to meet all emergency in case the Executive desires to enforce them. Is that the position of that side of the House?

Mr. FESS. That is the position I take. I do not speak for this side of the House. However, I will say to my friend, that I know that this side of the House will join that side of the House in passing any legislation the moment that the need of the legislation is assured. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GARNER. I gather, then, at this time—and I get some cheers from that side of the House—that there is no need of any legislation whatever, because the gentleman from Ohio is the first Republican to speak to any extent since the President delivered his message. He is certainly one of the leaders if we may judge, being chairman of the campaign committee of the Republican Party, and has taken a leading part in this House. Now, I will ask the gentleman fairly and squarely, Does the position he has taken to-day that there are sufficient laws on the books to meet every emergency—that is, to-day; of course, to-morrow or the next day may bring up a different state of affairs, but so far as to-day is concerned, the position of that side of the House is that we do not need any additional laws?

Mr. FESS. So far as I am concerned, I feel that if the disease is profiteering there is law to take care of it, and the very activity of the departments under the present administration without an iota of further law indicates there has been a lack of doing things rather than waiting for some law. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GARNER. I wanted to get what the gentleman's position was——

Mr. FESS. That is the position.

Mr. GARNER. And I presume the gentleman speaks for his side of the House.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman speaks only for himself.

Mr. BEGG. Ask him if he speaks for his side of the House.

Mr. CANNON. What is the position of the gentleman?

Mr. GARNER. We are waiting; it is your move. [Laughter on the Republican side of the House.]

Mr. FESS. I will be frank to say that the last suggestion of my friend from Texas carries too much real meaning to be laughed at by either side. It is the move that the administration is attempting to play by passing the buck to this side of the House by asking for more law, in the hope of blinding the public to the failure to use the law it now has. Your waiting for us to move is no defense for failure to move yourselves. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to my friend from New York.

Mr. PLATT. If I understood the gentleman correctly, he agrees with Gov. Harding, of the Federal Reserve Board, in the remedy he proposes?

Mr. FESS. I do; on the working and saving remedy.

Mr. PLATT. One thing that will bring real and lasting good is the working and saving—an increase of production and an increase of saving?

Mr. FESS. If my friend will extend the time so that I may finish what I have to say, he will be satisfied with what I will present on that score.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to conclude his remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio may be permitted to conclude his remarks. Does the gentleman mean the hour?

Mr. FESS. I will end them before that time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FESS. I want to thank the membership of the House, because the subject being discussed, I think, admits of serious consideration and ought to be discussed without any fight here politically. I confess I am somewhat embarrassed by my colleagues from the mere fact that, being chairman of a committee, every time I speak somebody gives it a political or a partisan tinge, which is a source of great embarrassment to me. I am attempting to discuss the question before us and am free of any partisanship except when by questions from the Democratic side I am compelled to answer.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I thought I gathered from the gentleman's remarks that the high cost of living is due to the situation of the currency of the country?

Mr. FESS. Very much so; yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask him whether or not he is in favor of reducing the purchasing price of a dollar or reducing the amount of currency that is now in circulation?

Mr. FESS. I certainly would not be in favor of reducing the purchasing price of the dollar, but increasing it. I would increase the purchasing price of the dollar by a gradual method of retiring the redundant currency that is far beyond the needs of the country, as demonstrated by the facts adduced by one of the most scholarly and thoughtful committees in all this country.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Would that be done by——

Mr. FESS. That would be done by the Treasury Department.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Suppose that you have increased the purchasing power of the dollar by reducing the currency, and suppose we have a failure of crops, or suppose there is such a demand for an article that the country can not supply it, that you can not get it, is that going to change the value of those commodities?

Mr. FESS. The law of supply and demand always determines, provided that under the laws under which we are operating—the political laws—the law of supply and demand can operate. That is what I want to do. Let the trade needs determine the amount of currency, not a Government bureau.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Under our Federal Reserve System is not that true of our currency, the supply and demand, and that they send it out whenever more is demanded?

Mr. FESS. The Federal Reserve System as it now is at work will permit credits upon anything found in cold storage or warehouses, or wherever else found, and turn fictitious values, which are to-day one thing and to-morrow another thing and next year another thing, into liquid assets, and you do not know what the value of those items is at all, and yet they serve as a basis for the issue of currency. There is $20 per capita of fiat now in our Federal reserve notes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That depends on what you term fiat money.

Mr. FESS. Fiat money means money in circulation without any specific value behind it save the fiat of the Government, which has always had many advocates in the country.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is such money as that issued by the Federal reserve banks?

Mr. FESS. It is increasing constantly by calling in currency based upon either Government bonds or species and issuing these notes.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to my friend.

Mr. GARNER. Is the gentleman from Ohio opposed to the Federal Reserve System?

Mr. FESS. I voted for it. I voted for it because we had an archaic system that needed revision, and the revision came through the Aldrich Commission, upon which was drafted the Aldrich plan, which the Democratic Party stole in toto, except in the central bank idea, discarded for the regional plan, the only Democratic feature and the weakest element in the system, and I was perfectly willing to vote for it.

Mr. GARNER. I am asking the gentleman now a serious question. I want——

Mr. FESS. I know it is serious, and I answered it seriously.

Mr. GARNER. Is the gentleman in favor of the Federal Reserve System?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Is it being wisely administered?

Mr. FESS. In time of war, in order to avoid what the board thought was a serious tie-up of money, they have responded to such an inflation of both currency and credit that it is becoming dangerous, and my friend from Texas will see it in due time if it is not corrected.

Mr. GARNER. I am asking the gentleman a direct question, and I would rather that he not dodge it.

Mr. FESS. I am not dodging, I will say to my friend.

Mr. GARNER. He says that he is in favor of the Federal Reserve System. Now, is it being wisely administered at this time?

Mr. FESS. At the present moment I doubt the wisdom of its administration, and I am satisfied that the statement of Gov. Harding, made public yesterday, is totally misleading.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. PLATT. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the Treasury Department could arbitrarily decrease the circulation?

Mr. FESS. I presume I should not have said "arbitrarily."

Mr. PLATT. The remedy, as I see it, is, as Gov. Harding says, in that it lies with the people. If the people will save their bonds and not use them for material gain, the circulation will come down automatically.

Mr. FESS. We are begging the question.

Mr. PLATT. We are not.

Mr. FESS. Bonds can be found in every store in this town, deposited instead of money, and bonds have become a part of the currency of the country. The expansion of the currency based upon commercial paper of various values in an attempt to liquefy the wealth of the country permits an increase of price without a corresponding increase of value. This means we are floating bonds paid for by our people in a cheap currency, which will be redeemed in years to come in a dearer currency. My contention is against this inflation to avoid a depreciated dollar in the onset. But instead we have inflated it to the point where it is depreciated, and it probably will not buy a half or a third of what it would five years ago.

Mr. PLATT. Does the Government bond inflate credit any more than a railroad bond or an industrial bond?

Mr. FESS. Yes; because the Government issues without limit, save contingent value of commercial paper, with no stability of price, but vacillates with the market, while a railroad issues with reference to the property on which the bond is issued.

Mr. PLATT. The Government has limited its issues now.

Mr. FESS. If my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, does not want the Federal reserve administration as now administered pointed out, it is his concern clearly and not mine. I ask your attention to the export trade just now.

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. FESS. I would like to enter upon a discussion of the export trade, if you please.

Mr. UPSHAW. Before you leave that other.

Mr. FESS. I yield to my friend. I can not refuse to yield to such a good friend.

Mr. UPSHAW. The gentleman said this side of the House stole the Federal Reserve Banking System. I understood it was playfully said, but very genuinely.

Mr. FESS. I ought not to have used the ugly word "stole."

Mr. UPSHAW. If a case of theft were ever right, does not the gentleman think the Democratic Party is to be pardoned for stealing a system which is so good that it saved the country from a financial panic? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FESS. I think stealing on the part of the Democratic Party is always justified, because they would never get it in any other way. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] I will withdraw that remark.

Mr. UPSHAW. I understand, thoroughly; but if this Federal Reserve System was good enough for the gentleman from Ohio and his colleagues to vote for at one time, why was it not good enough for the Democratic Party to put over when they had a chance? If it has saved the country from a financial panic, is it not a good enough thing for us to share the glory of it?

Mr. FESS. If the gentleman had been here in 1913 that question would not have been asked.

EXPORT TRADE.

When the war opened in Europe our open market was entered by the belligerent powers bidding for all we produced, hence the natural advance in price. When we entered the war we undertook to regulate the export trade. The war called millions away from production into consumption, which widened the chasm between the two. With the war over we still find Europe's production interrupted and looking to us for supply. We are told we must not only supply them with raw materials, including food and feed, but we must loan them money with which to pay for it.

That is the point, fellow Members, that I should like to get before the House. Men go to Europe, study the situation there, and come back and report on the dismal situation of the people of Europe, and ask that this country finance Europe, and money is loaned with a lurking hope on the part of certain portions of Europe that it will never be paid. All through Europe, in official representative bodies, you hear the statement repeated that there must be a reassessment of the cost of the war, and that the United States, which has made money out of the war, must be required to pay its share; and we have people in this country that are tending in the same way. So that Europe is not only demanding what we produce, but expecting us to loan that with which to pay, in the hope that they will not be called upon to pay it back, and we ought to be quite specific that while we are assisting Europe in her dire distress we must not put our own people to the point of suffering because of a sentimentality that has not a sounder basis than mere maudlin sympathy. That is one danger from which we are now suffering.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes; I will yield to my friend.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Does the gentleman know that the Federal taxes of the United States have been increased in round numbers 2,000 per cent while the Federal taxes of France have only been increased 6 per cent since the beginning of this war? They are depending entirely upon their own ability to borrow money.

Mr. FESS. That is a remarkable statement, I will say to my friend.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is true.

Mr. FESS. And if it is an accurate statement—and I have no reason to think it is not, because otherwise the gentleman would not give it—it is quite astonishing.

Fellow Members, my judgment is that the remedy here is to force Europe to go to work. Not that I have no regard for their present suffering, but because I have too much concern for their future welfare.

The remedy here is to force Europe to work. Self-helpfulness must be resumed. War has had the effect to induce idleness, as may be seen to-day in France and Belgium and elsewhere. Already can be read placards all over Paris, "To work! To work!" This indicates that France properly senses the problem.

There must be a relief from that idleness which persists in the belief that "I have done my duty now let the Government provide bountifully for me the rest of my days." Rehabilitation of Europe can only be assured by organized production encompassing the entire populations. Here is where our influence should be felt rather than too great a willingness to supply all their needs with gratuitous altruism.

Exports must be regulated. We exported in June last $918,000,000 and for the year $7,225,000,000. The power that fixes the price of our surplus can easily fix the entire home production. Here is a function of the Government in its regulatory administration to insure against actual suffering of our own people while we are busy looking after the interests of Europe and Asia.

The sooner we are out of Europe the better it will be for both Europe and America. [Applause.] This is the testimony of every soldier boy returning and of every Member of Congress who has given an opinion upon the relation between this country and Europe.

The war machinery, so expensive because so all pervasive, should at once be dismantled. The hundred and one agencies which attached themselves to the pay roll of the Government by whatever authority organized and set in motion should be disbanded, except such as the War Risk Insurance Bureau, which must be reorganized or else displaced by some bureau which can give better service. There are some things in this bureau we must do. We should transfer the compensation division to the Pension Department at once. Steps must be taken to insure better results in the insurance division or else take steps to reach an agreement with insurance companies to take over the work. The present system simply is intolerable and has been from the beginning, with little promise of improvement.

While I would not withhold any power necessary for the President to protect the public against the profiteer when once it appears he has not that power which he doubtless has, I do not look with any favor whatever on continuing war legislation in peace time, much less on increasing the war power of the President. His suggestion of a license for business is an obnoxious interference with freedom of the law of supply and demand, and should be resorted to only as a last resort when other things fail. On the other hand, we should at once repeal every vestige of war legislation necessary to force the country on a peace basis.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes; I yield to my friend from Minnesota.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. May I not suggest to the gentleman that the President while in Paris issued four or five orders withdrawing from the license system the various industries, including the licensing of storage houses? Up to the time of that withdrawal any profiteer could have had his license withdrawn and his right to continue in business prohibited. But at Paris, France, all concerns, including cold-storage houses, were withdrawn from that license provision. I thought the gentleman might be glad to have that interruption.

Mr. FESS. I thank the gentleman for the interruption, because it adds a fact with which I was not entirely familiar, and if the gentleman gives that upon authority I gladly accept it.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I have seen the orders.

Mr. FESS. On the other hand, I mean instead of increasing this legislation we should at once repeal every vestige of war legislation that is necessary to force the country back upon a peace basis, for it is well known by every Member of this House, Republican and Democrat, that we will not get back on a peace basis unless we force it. You once make an attachment to the public pay roll and there is no possibility of dissociation unless you use the meat ax or the corn knife.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes; I yield to my friend from Texas.

Mr. GARNER. I agree with the last statement that the gentleman made. I agree that these laws ought to be repealed. Why do not you repeal them? You are in power here. Your side is in the majority and in control of the House. Why not repeal them?

Mr. FESS. Oh, they will be repealed.

Mr. GARNER. I am talking not about "will" or "has been," but why not repeal them now?

Mr. FESS. It is a pertinent inquiry that whenever something is on that has danger in it somebody who hangs to the skirts of the big man wants to know why we do not embarrass him by taking from him what he already has at the time when he is asking for even more.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman contend that it will embarrass the "big man" that he refers to by repealing these laws?

Mr. FESS. If he demands more laws, as he did recently, and you repeal what he has, I fear it would embarrass him and give him further excuse for administration inaction.

Mr. GARNER. He has not requested the repeal of the law. He has demanded the enactment of an entirely different kind of a law.

Mr. FESS. It will interfere with the play that he is making.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman is talking about another kind of play.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. If we attempted to repeal certain war-time laws, would it not be repeating the experience we had when we repealed the daylight-saving law? When we repealed it we had the repeal vetoed.

Mr. FESS. A very pertinent observation. The President indicated his desire for extension of the food-control act so as to cover feeds and fuel, as well as food, and have a penalty attached. The President has been so absorbed in European affairs for the past seven months that he has forgotten the terms of the law to which he refers, the first section of which defines necessaries as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That by reason of the existence of a state of war, it is essential to the national security and defense, for the successful prosecution of the war, and for the support and maintenance of the Army and Navy, to assure an adequate supply and equitable distribution, and to facilitate the movement of foods, feeds, fuel including fuel oil and natural gas, and fertilizer and fertilizer ingredients, tools, utensils, implements, machinery, and equipment required for the actual production of foods, feeds, and fuel, hereafter in this act called necessaries.

Section 6 of the act covers hoarding, which the President had overlooked.

SEC. 6. That any person who willfully hoards any necessaries shall upon conviction thereof be fined not exceeding $5,000 or be imprisoned for not more than two years, or both. Necessaries shall be deemed to be hoarded within the meaning of this act when either (a) held, contracted for, or arranged for by any person in a quantity in excess of his reasonable requirements for use or consumption by himself and dependents for a reasonable time; (b) held, contracted for, or arranged for by any manufacturer, wholesaler, retailer, or other dealer in a quantity in excess of the reasonable requirements of his business for use or sale by him for a reasonable time, or reasonably required to furnish necessaries produced in surplus quantities seasonally throughout the period of scant or no production; or (c) withheld, whether by possession or under any contract or arrangement, from the market by any person for the purpose of unreasonably increasing or diminishing the price: Provided, That this section shall not include or relate to transactions on any exchange, board of trade, or similar institution or place of business as described in section 13 of this act that may be permitted by the President under the authority conferred upon him by said section 13: Provided, however, That any accumulating or withholding by any farmer or gardner, cooperative association of farmers, or gardeners, including live-stock farmers, or any other person, of the products of any farm, garden, or other land owned, leased, or cultivated by him shall not be deemed to be hoarding within the meaning of this act.

The ample penalties fixed in the law had also escaped the eye of the President.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to my friend from Alabama.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Does the gentleman refer to the espionage act as one of the war laws that ought to be repealed?

Mr. FESS. It ought to be repealed, and will be repealed by limitation as soon as the war is over, because it ceases with the end of the war.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. But the gentleman is aware that certain interests are endeavering to have similar legislation enacted, to be in force during times of peace?

Mr. FESS. I will say to my friend from Alabama that there is not a law on the statute books placed there under the stress of war, when we virtually ceased for the time to be a democratic Government, that some interests are not trying to keep there, just the same as the one to which my friend refers.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I am happy to infer from what the gentleman says that he does not favor any such repressive legislation.

Mr. FESS. I do not; and the sooner we get away from war legislation the better for all the Nation.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to my friend from Kentucky.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Just a few days ago, when the President addressed the House and the Senate, and was asking an extension of power, and that more power be given under these war regulations, did it not meet with hearty applause on the Democratic side?

Mr. FESS. It certainly did, as everything he says meets with hearty outward applause over there, no matter what may be the common remarks in the cloakroom later; there are bitter enders, and there are the toadiest of the toadies, who no matter what is said in public or done at home or abroad declare that it is all right, because we live in a time when certain people have abdicated individual opinions and bank upon the easy-going practice of following a leader who can not make or think of a mistake. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARNER. And up to date your side of the House has been quite as obedient as our side of the House has for two years.

Mr. FESS. Well, that is an even draw. I was referring to the necessity of dismantling this war machine and repealing these laws.

This should be done at all hazards to put a stop to the vast waste of war times. No further power should be granted that will prevent speedy elimination of war expenses.

The Government's fiscal obligations will amount to at least $25,000,000,000, upon which there is an annual interest charge greater than the total expenses of the Government prior to the war. The monthly expenditures of the Government since last January have been over $1,400,000,000. The total disbursements of last month, as reported in the daily Treasury report July 30, were $2,324,927,311. While this item included bonds, interest-bearing notes, and certificates retired, it was nevertheless a charge on the Treasury that can not be met by mere bookkeeping, and this is 10 months after the war is over.

There is small hope of lowering the cost of living so long as we continue to call upon the Treasury for such outlays. There is little hope that we shall ever again have light taxation, at least for years to come, until we wipe out these demands for cash. Hence the scale of the cost of living must be high. Our duty is to cut off every item of unnecessary expense attached to the war machine, and return the army of civil employees, gathered from the four corners of the country, to a more productive life. Nine months after the war is over we still report employees in Washington constantly increasing. The month of July brought 237 more than were here in June. The pay roll continues to grow.

The wickedly wasteful practice of "cost plus" during the war so dulled our sense of economy in this riot of expenditure into which we entered two years ago that it still persists, as revealed by the partial reports of the Committee on War Expenditures.

If the War Department does not of its own initiative convert the war material into cash, then, as in the case of stored meats and vegetables, Congress should direct it done at once. It is reported that there are now being held in various places at least 135,000 trucks, many of them out in the weather, where, as in case of meat which was spoiled, the trucks will soon be of no value. Officers when asked why they are not sold pretend innocent ignorance. Some of them declare their belief that they will never be sold.

Congressmen returning from France declare there is easily billions of dollars' worth of property over there. In conversation with one of our colleagues but yesterday who has just returned from Europe, he declared his outraged feelings over the advantage Europe takes of this country. He especially refers to their disregard for their promise as to our horses and mules left in France. Instead of fear of breaking the market, all these diversified goods should be immediately converted into money and covered into the Treasury, and the organization at once disbanded as one less war agency to maintain.

Extravagance is a certain and inevitable product of war. The Government sets the pace and the populations fall in line. Never in the history of nations is this demonstrated as to-day. One billion two hundred million dollars for aviation and only 213 American planes in Europe. Open charge of official corruption. Aircraft investigation report, and recommendation of court-martial dismissed as groundless. The only echo is an eloquent peroration of the Secretary of War on the Government's achievements.

Ford Eagle boats belong in the same category, and will never get farther than Admiral Earle's testimony.

Three billion eight hundred million dollars for the Shipping Board, and yet we paid handsomely Great Britain for transporting 54 per cent of our own boys to Europe. On Hog Island, where profiteering in labor seems to have reached high tide, it is reported in the employment of 20,000 laborers there were hired and fired together about 268,000 on "cost-plus" basis.

As an item of governmental economy, the rent for the first nine months for the Food Administration in the District of Columbia, to say nothing in the 48 States, was $86,000; clerks at last report were 1,500. The clerical force in the War Risk Bureau is 19,000, most of them in one another's way, and the force still growing at last reports.

Another example of governmental persistence is found in the Housing Commission, just now circularizing the Congress to convince us that unless we make permanent this temporary war emergency of a socialistic character as a permanent peace regulation we have lost our opportunity as forward-looking legislators. It is the old story—give an American a Government position with a salary attached and you have a permanent institution ever thereafter.

I want to take just a moment to enter the field that my friend from New York [Mr. PLATT] mentioned.

The lavish employment of funds by the Government's extravagant operations, in which it did over $50,000,000,000 worth of business, almost all of which was borrowed capital, handled by persons whose past business experience had not up to date greatly impressed the country, quite naturally induced similar habits of extravagance among our people. Laborers were multiplied on a given piece of work, wages were increased, hours were reduced, time and a half for overtime was allowed; profiteering at high tide; ready money came as never before and it went as never before. Everybody had money to spend. Every train was crowded, even dining and Pullman cars were at a premium; automobiles were in the possession of one out of every five in places like our Capital City. Price cuts no figure for merchandise. Every business was alarmingly prosperous; girls paid three prices for shoes and wearing apparel; merchants saw an unlimited demand at any price for a limited supply—and so goes the orgy of extravagance just as if it will last always. This can not indefinitely continue. The day of paying up will come. It is not necessary to pay these exorbitant prices. They are charged because people are willing to pay the charge.

A friend of mine sent his servant down to a bargain store to buy a $3 pair of easy working shoes. The servant came back with a $17 pair, on the conviction that no decent servant would wear the flat-heel $3 pair. This is the rule to-day in the buying world. It will continue until we reach bottom, either by wise frugality or by the discipline of hard times. Nothing is more certain.

It is our boast that our wealth as a Nation is greater than the combined wealth of Great Britain, France, and Italy, and our annual income is equal to half the total wealth of Great Britain. Our comparative situation when examined in wealth, income, and national debt makes us careless of our resources.

Our wealth is $300,000,000,000, income $60,000,000,000, and debt only $24,000,000,000.

Great Britain's wealth is $120,000,000,000, income $15,000,000,000, and a public debt of $36,000,000,000.

France's wealth may be estimated at ninety billion, her income twelve billion, and debt thirty-six billion.

Italy stood, wealth 40 billion, income four and one-half billion, and debt $12,600,000,000.

Germany stood, prior to the war, wealth eighty billion, income ten billion, and debt thirty-nine billion, which she will likely repudiate.

Our per capita debt is about $220; Britain's, $780; France, $900; Italy, $350; and Germany about $600.

Our interest charge on each $100 income is about $1.66; Great Britain, $10.16; France, $15; Italy, $7.30; and Germany, $19.50.

In a country like ours, so vastly wealthy, which makes of our borrowing campaigns a veritable spree of money lending, even to the extent of borrowing in order to lend, our people, unused to habits of frugality, are flush with a Government inflated pay roll, and they demand the best, which sends prices skyward. If this delirium of expenditure does not give way to sane, frugal habits we are doomed for a crash in time.

This Congress should take steps to help the Government out of business as soon as it can be done without harm to the public. Instead of further shackling the industries of the country, we should remove the governmental barriers of enterprise and permit the existent industries to expand to meet the demands of a growing country and encourage new industries to build. We should in the near future increase our agricultural acreage, but by such legislation as will safeguard the public against deception and will protect the Government against raids upon the Treasury by selfish interests, so all persistent in times like these.

We should encourage enterprise in order to insure profitable investment of every idle dollar of capital and steady and healthy employment of every toiler in the land at an American wage.

True it is, wherever the arm of the law is necessary to correct abuses it must be done. When the producer of live stock sells to the packers on a falling market, and the consumer buys of the retailer on a rising market, there is something rotten which must be corrected by the Government.

We have abundant laws to take care of such cases. The Hutchinson bill to control cold storage, introduced several days before the President came to Congress, is now before the Committee on Agriculture, where it will be considered, and if thought necessary for the safety of the public it will be reported out and doubtless passed by the House.

Mr. Speaker, I leave off as I began, that the evils of hoarding and profiteering can be cured if we but enforce the law that we have. But the real step this administration must take is to dismantle this war machine, close up these extravagances, increase the purchasing power of our circulating medium, regulate our exports, get the Government out of transportation and other businesses, and thereby get back on the basis of efficient service away from the riot of bleeding an industry, organize our people out of the activities of war into the industries of peace, thereby increase production and reduce the cost to the consumer, and we shall then be in the best possible position to insure America as the home of the happiest as well as the most powerful of all the nations, and while we will continue to extend our succor to Europe and the outside world, we will still hold fast to America and American ideals. Our real duty is here and now.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to address the House for 20 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I have sought opportunity to address the House for the purpose of reminding my colleagues here of a plain duty which confronts us.

During the World War many sacrifices were made, but I believe all will agree that the greatest sacrifice was made by the private soldier of the Army and the enlisted sailor of the Navy. [Applause.] I am not speaking now of the hardships these men endured. I am speaking of the great financial sacrifice made by the private soldier and the ordinary enlisted seaman.

These men won the war. They should at least be treated fairly. Take the case of the private in the Army. His compensation was $1 per day. He had little freedom of action. Of course, he did not expect much. He knew he must submit to rigid discipline, and he submitted cheerfully and without protest. While he was undergoing training in the cantonment he saw unskilled laborers work eight hours a day for a wage four and five times as great as his. He saw them quit work in the afternoon at a given signal, with plenty of daylight remaining to take in some amusement and enjoy part of the unprecedented wage he was receiving. But the soldier must observe discipline. He was not free; this unskilled laborer was. The soldier must get permission to take in a picture show; the laborer, with his $5 per day, responded to his own wishes and desires. He was forced to consult nobody. Of course, this very extreme difference in wage put the soldier to thinking. He knew he was making a sacrifice greater than anyone around him, but he did his duty uncomplainingly, in the firm belief that a great, rich, grateful Government would in the end do justice by him. This same private saw everyone around him reaping a rich harvest because of the war, which he was expected to win and which he did win. He accepted his $1 per day and relied upon the justice of the Nation for whose flag he was willing to die.

This same private soldier was sent to Europe. He made July 18, 1918, a day never to be forgotten. [Applause.] He won a victory at Chateau-Thierry which will mark an epoch in the history of the world. He pressed on; he endured privation and suffering during the Argonne drive impossible to describe. He was then receiving increased pay. He was actually receiving $1.10 per day, but he never once complained. He knew war was hell, and he wanted to make short work of the nasty job. He wanted to press on to Berlin and see his Nation dictate the terms of peace from the palace of the Kaiser. He pressed on and on, never once turning back, until he was ordered to stop. He was disappointed that the order to stop came before he got to Berlin; he did not openly protest—he had learned to obey orders—but he was not satisfied. But in any event there was glory enough for all. The job was finished. The courage, the staying quality, of the American private soldier had won the war. [Applause.]

Demobilization appeared to him to be proceeding a little slowly, but still he did not complain. At last he is brought back home. He learns after his arrival that everybody has been making money. He learns that many a rivet driver in the shipyard received as much in one day as he did in a month. He learns that these men, as a rule, received more in one day than he did in a week. He saw the corner groceryman with whom he had been accustomed to trade enjoying comforts and luxuries never dreamed of before the war. He learned that wages had been increased on every hand, in some instances doubled and trebled. He returned to see the Nation he had risked his life to save literally rolling in wealth. Now, imagine, if you can, the feelings of this private soldier when this great, rich, grateful Government handed him the munificent sum of $60. [Applause.] Imagine his feelings, if you can, when he saw the war worker here in Washington, whose salary was three or four times as large as his, receive a bonus of $240. Imagine his feelings, if you can, when he saw the business he had started in the hands of some one else or the job he had given up filled by some one else, all prosperous, while he was forced to be content with his $60. Imagine also his feelings, if you can, when he went with his $60 into the furnishing store to buy clothes to take the place of his uniform, and learned the prices of the things he was bound to have.

Mr. PLATT. The war workers are continuing to work. We are paying them for work which they are doing.

Mr. POU. Yes; and they are now getting $240 for every year in addition to the salary they agreed to work for. These soldiers went to the front and risked their lives, and when they return we hand them a paltry $60.

Mr. PLATT. We paid the war workers $120 last year. This year we pay them $240; but they are working all the time.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. About half working.

Mr. PLATT. If they are not all working that is not our fault.

Mr. POU. If the gentleman wants to offer that as an excuse for nonaction on this question, that is a matter for himself. I say it is no excuse.

Mr. UPSHAW. May I suggest that if it had not been for the loyalty and sacrifice of these soldiers there would not have been any chance for the war workers to work.

Mr. POU. Exactly so. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, do you wonder there is a feeling of dissatisfaction among these men? Most of them are too proud to admit it, but I tell you there is a prevailing feeling that they have not had a square deal, and they know just where the responsibility rests. They know Congress must act. They know that Congress alone has the power.

The question therefore is, What are we going to do for these men? In the first place, let us keep politics out of this question. Let there be no sparring for political advantage. I have talked with a great many soldiers and sailors. I have tried to get the viewpoint of the men who did not hold commissions. After all, I repeat what all will admit, they are the boys who did the job. The soldiers and sailors who did the actual fighting are the men entitled to our first consideration. Several bills have been introduced. One of these I have introduced myself, but as to authorship I care not the snap of my finger. I want to see this Congress during this extra session before the 1st day of October pass some measure which more nearly does justice to the private soldier and enlisted sailor. This much at least should be done. These men should be given a sum of money which will aid them in starting life anew. The $60 did not half pay for the civilian outfit.

In my judgment, it would be only just to give to each man a sum equal to the bonus paid the war workers, who did no fighting, endured no hardships compared to the private soldier and sailor. No man should receive less than $180; that is to say, $240 less $60 already paid.

Now, I know certain gentlemen will immediately begin to figure the amount of the appropriation necessary. Certain gentlemen who aspire to be called the watchdogs of the Treasury will be horror stricken when they figure the appropriation necessary.

I submit this observation: When the war was on nobody stopped to figure when appropriations were actually needed. Now, these men have done more than was expected of them. They brought the war to an end fully one year ahead of the time anybody dreamed it could be brought to an end. By their conduct they not only brought glory to America but saved the expenditure of many billions—not millions. I submit, therefore, it is no answer to a just proposal to figure out the millions it will require. Justice should be done, no matter what the cost. The country is rich enough and the people of America are willing to see a square deal accorded the men who won this war.

Mr. Speaker, we can not afford to pay the war worker a bonus of $240 and the war fighter $60. If these were to be the figures, the $240 should have been paid to the private soldier, to the enlisted sailor, while the $60 should have gone to the war worker.

Even now it is not too late to do justice. Oh, no, Mr. Speaker, even now it is not too late to do justice to these men. And let me say this in conclusion: There are some men who have no heart to play politics when it comes to the question of dealing with the soldiers. There are men who have been struck too hard and have felt the blow too heavily to even attempt to play politics when it comes to dealing with the soldiers, some of whom we saw marching down the Avenue to-day. God bless them every one! [Applause.] Discarding politics from my heart I would say now to every colleague in this Chamber we can not afford to let this session end without doing something in addition to the paltry $60 which these men have received. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I wish to discuss the high cost of living.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must ask unanimous consent to address the House.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I make that request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to discuss the high cost of living for 20 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I do not lay the flattering unction to my soul that what I say here will bring the millennium into the great depot of humanity by a fraction of a second sooner than that period in which it is ordained to arrive, and as the great emancipator, Lincoln, said at Gettysburg, I know that the world will little note nor long remember what we say here to-day, but it will remember what we do here in behalf of the great people of this magnificent country in solving the greatest problem that has come to them for solution in the history of this Republic, a problem so grave that it takes place only second in importance to the great wars incident to the purpose of winning and securing our liberties and maintaining them.

Mr. Speaker, I know that this Congress, the concrete expression of the wisdom of the people of the United States of America, will settle this problem, and settle it correctly and upon proper lines. Having the advice of the pulpit, journalism, and the university, and with their own talent, it is inevitable that this question will be settled to the satisfaction of the American people. Unawed by the murmurings of the lowly—and we have a sympathetic ear for their murmurings—unterrified by the ominous, menacing whispers of the great and exalted, I know that this Congress will solve and settle the problem of the high cost of living and its incident perils in accordance with the conscience and the best judgment of the American people. [Applause.] They will settle it not for the purpose of satisfying any particular class but in response to the demand, the cry, of the American people and in conformity with the principles of truth and justice. Unterrified by the great and exalted, unmoved by the clamor of the crowd, there will be no oppression, no tyranny—law, order, and justice will be maintained. My friends, to illustrate what I have in mind, permit me to tell you a story that I heard told in the long ago. I was then a student at Tulane University, down in New Orleans, and one of the greatest civilians that ever came into the legal life of this country was endeavoring to make us understand that a witness that took the stand should be there for the purpose of telling the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, out of regard for and love of truth alone. He illustrated by telling the story of the girl who walked the walls of the ancient city in the long, long ago, carrying a torch in one hand and a pail of water in the other, singing, "With this torch I will burn the heavens and with this pail of water I will extinguish the fires of hell, so that God may be loved for himself alone—without hope of reward, without fear of punishment." That is the attitude of this Congress, I know, with respect to this all-absorbing question which involves the happiness, the welfare, of the people of this land. [Applause.] We want to solve it so as to bring happiness and hope into the lives of our people—wage earner, day laborer, salary man, employer, industrialist, and banker—for we are one—the American people.

I heard a great deal on the floor of this House about the operation of that law which is known as the law of supply and demand. Let us recognize the facts of human existence as they present themselves to the ordinary beholder, to the everyday citizen of this Republic. You have brought into existence refrigerators and other instrumentalities which in themselves have created laws which have suspended that great law of supply and demand; instrumentalities which when operated along just lines may promote the general welfare, but when conducted with the sinister purpose of creating an apparent shortage in food products and an unwarranted, unnatural, and artificial advance in prices become a menace to the millions of consumers.

Need I say, Mr. Speaker, that a readjustment of the railroad systems is necessary which will make for a proper allotment of business to all of the ports of the country, whereby one will not suffer from congestion and become a danger to all of the people of this country. That will be a step in the right direction. There should be a just and fair allocation of ships to the various ports, and an extension of the great highways and roads, and the building of national roads, North and South, East and West, if you will, to bring about that system of distribution which it is the duty of this Congress to work out, as a solution of the great problem that confronts the people of this country. A scientific system of distribution will follow as night the day. I am not dismayed by that problem, and I know that those who have served here since long ago, who have faced and solved the problems which have confronted this country, will not be dismayed by it. We can never forget that splendid figure, who has the love and the affection of both sides of the House, when he took the floor a few days ago and spoke about the bravery of the people of his section of the great State of Illinois, Mr. CANNON, using the expression, "As brave but not braver than you of the South, as brave but not braver than you of the East, as brave but not braver than you of the North, for we are all one people, divided only as the waves but one as the sea, and our destiny is to accomplish great things, to do noble things, and not to dream them all day long." That gentleman, who has the love and affection of all of this House, stood on this floor and repeated to us that which we should not forget, and that is that as long as the generations of man shall come to inhabit this earth there will be great and trying problems to solve. It was so in the beginning. It will be so, my fellow countrymen, when the last chapter is written in the affairs of man. Whose remarkable words are these?

Careless seems the Great Avenger. History's pages but record
One death grapple in the darkness twixt old systems and the Word.
Truth forever on the scaffold, Wrong forever on the throne;
Yet that scaffold sways the Future, and behind the dim Unknown
Standeth God within the shadow, keeping watch above His own.

The God of this Nation will, I trust, as long as we remain a patriotic and religious people, keep us within mind, and even though he stands within the shadow all will go well for the people of this great country.

At this juncture, Mr. Speaker, I am reminded of what was said here a few days ago most eloquently by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK], who told us something that we knew, but which it was gratifying for us to hear again, that our brave boys on land and sea had duplicated all of the wonderful military and naval accomplishments of bygone years. They were as brave, as dauntless, as the phalanxes that followed Alexander as he swept down the Macedonian hills and over the Asiatic sands and made dynasties reel and crumble before his advance. Then he told us of the great Julius as he went through the swamps and morasses of Gaul with his conquering legions, and he suggested the wonderful epileptic, Mahomet, wandering over the sands of Arabia and who suddenly gathered behind him a conquering army from the wilds of his region and changed not only the customs and manners of Europe but almost its religion; and of Tamerlane and Genghis Khan and Attila and the mighty Corsican. He told in thrilling tones of some wonderful naval accomplishments of centuries past on the seven seas, and I thought, is the destiny of my country to be nothing more or less than a repetition of these great events on land and sea? Waterloos and Trafalgars, Salamis, dark Actinum's fatal shore, Pharsalia, Arbil, and the floods and fields that suggest the conquerors who were willing to wade through slaughter to a throne and shut the gates of mercy on mankind.

And then I thought of what another speaker had said on the floor of this House, that we are rapidly approaching that degree in art when we would compare favorably with the age of Phidias and Pericles; that we would attain the glory that was of Greece, the grandeur that was of Rome; and I felt with sad misgivings that all of our art came from two or three thousand years ago, and there came to me a vision of the wonderful temples and palaces and pyramids that lined the Nile, and I came to the conclusion that our architectural and engineering genius and our originality came from afar, and I wondered what can be the mission of this great Republic? Is it merely to be a replica of those magnificent civilizations that came and went, that played their part in the affairs of men and then tottered to their destruction and fall? Or is it in the mind of the great Omnipotent that we shall have a greater purpose and a higher mission? I trust that purpose is to scatter plenty over a smiling land and to write a nation's history in its eyes, a purpose which, in my judgment, is far better, higher, and holier than all the victories that have been written in the pages of any country and which but add to that thirst for military glory that ever filled the minds of those who would seek reputation at the cannon's mouth.

For true, indeed, did Gibbon speak in his immortal Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire when he declared that just so long as mankind continues to bestow more liberal applause on their destroyers than on their benefactors will the thirst of military glory ever be the vice of the most exalted. A long succession of poets and historians have aroused a dangerous spirit of emulation in the minds of madmen who try to set the world on fire every now and then like the imperial war lords of the German Empire.

May my country rise to heights never before attained by any nation, modern or ancient, not in material transcendentalism, not in private palaces, not in the brilliancy of its social resorts, poor and weak imitations of that which was in Babylon thousands of years ago, but in literature which will rival that book written 2,000 years before Joseph was sold into captivity and long before the dawn of Judaism began, Egypt's celebrated Book of the Dead, and the Bible, the glory of the religious thought of the Christian world, the Iliad, on which all poetry seems to be modeled, and in the newer thing—the spirit of the new dispensation, the manifestation of which will make for a broader and purer and nobler Americanism, that Americanism which will mean that government must make for the welfare of the people, not in platitudinous sentences but in reality; a government which has for its purpose the insurance of every man and woman and boy and girl in each generation enough to eat and wear, with proper shelter and an opportunity to earn a competence for old age—the golden age on earth, if you will, when mankind will not be shadowed from the cradle to the grave by the horrible, terrifying fear of poverty in old age. That is all we pray, we who believe in the new order—an assurance against want and the opportunity to share in the wonders of the universe through the telescope and the microscope and to get a strain from the spheres through the wondrous beauty of our own song and music. Oh, it is great—and there is no other greatness—to make some nook of God's creation a little better and brighter. It is the work for the great American people; it is their mission—the splendid road over which they are to journey by direction of the One above. With minds steeled upon this Utopia, if you will move forward, my American countrymen and countrywomen, your own desires will lift you up to what appears the unattainable.

The new order is in sight. Never again shall we play the part of Sisyphus rolling up the old civilization with its apparent glories to the summit of the hill of history only to have it roll back into the abyss of nothingness—and then start all over again, to attain what? The material splendors which seem to have been the aim, the goal, the curse, of all the nations that have come and gone since creation's dawn.

We can make the start on this great, great journey. This Congress represents the life of this Nation. I do not mean to flatter. You are here as the representatives of 110,000,000 people, and you must have talent, ability, something that has justified the districts in sending you here, the Capital of the Nation. You can solve the problem ahead of—yes, before us—and it will make us great to solve it. To have share in the sorrows of our people broadens the mind, tempers the vision, and makes golden the hearthstone where we with loved ones dwell.

We can, we must, bring into the life of 47,000,000 wage earners of our country happiness, because they are our kith and our kin, our blood. We may have lost sight of them—if we are occupying exalted position—but they are ours, and they have a right to live as decent Americans. "Once at least our paths have crossed." This is their home. They are Americans. They are appealing to us as wage earners have appealed in all ages for the right to live, not as hewers of wood and as drawers of water, but as men and women who came into the world to play a decent and not an ignoble part in the grand drama of existence. Age old is the cry, expressed by Heber—

From Greenland's icy mountains,
From India's coral strands,
Where Afric's sunny fountains
Stream down their golden sands.

From many an ancient river,
From many a palmy plain,
They call us to deliver
Their land from error's chain.

And by settling it along proper lines you will bring ultimately happiness into the life of the employer, the industrialist, the banker, the man of commerce. For mankind are one in spirit. In the gain or loss of one race all the rest have equal claim.

God knows, good and evil will always be in the world, always. But with the independence, the greatness, the goodness, in American life, we look for an expression from this Congress to settle this matter upon lines that will bring employer and employee together closer as American citizens working for the glory of their common country. [Applause.]

New occasions teach new duties; time makes ancient good uncouth;
They must upwards still and onward who would keep abreast of truth.
Lo, before us gleam their camp fires; we ourselves must pilgrims be,
Launch our Mayflower and steer boldly through the desperate winter's sea,
Nor attempt the future's portals with the past's blood-rusted key.

Gentlemen, I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 20 minutes.

INVESTIGATION OF THOMAS J. MOONEY.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas has a privileged resolution.

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the gentleman withhold that?

Mr. BLANTON. I have withheld it for two or three hours. It will not take but a few minutes to dispose of it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 225.

Resolved, That the Secretary of Labor be, and he is hereby, directed to report forthwith to the House of Representatives of the United States of America the following facts:

(1) Copies of all such instructions mentioned by John B. Densmore as having been received by him during the months of May, June, July, August, September, and October, 1918, he having said:

"SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., November 1, 1918.

"Hon W. B. WILSON,
"Secretary of Labor, Washington, D. C.

"SIR: Pursuant to instructions received from time to time during the past six months, I have the honor to report that I have conducted a secret and altogether informal inquiry into the Mooney case, and beg leave to submit herewith the results of my investigation."

(2) The names of all persons who, under the direction of any branch of the Department of Labor, had anything to do with the investigation of Thomas J. Mooney, charged with and convicted for heinous crime in California, stating in detail their respective activities, the amount of compensation paid them respectively, and the expenses of such investigation itemized in detail during the six months between May 1 and November 1, 1918.

(3) What connection in behalf of the Department of Labor, if any, since the punishment of said Thomas J. Mooney was commuted to life imprisonment, and since November 1, 1918, has any employee of the Department of Labor had with said case of Thomas J. Mooney, stating such activities in detail, the expense of same itemized in detail, and upon what authority of law, attaching copies of all reports made thereunder to the Department of Labor.

(4) What activities, if any, are now being conducted in behalf of Thomas J. Mooney.

(5) Attach copies of vouchers of McPherson, Kelly, and Kilmer for July, 1918, covering their trip from San Francisco to Los Angeles, the purpose of such trip and expense of same itemized.

(6) Attach copy of letter of instructions sent by John B. Densmore to H. L. Cobb after Cobb was sent to Texas on propaganda trip for Employment Bureau and expense of trip itemized in detail.

(7) Attach all reports of Gallagher and Martin for their six weeks spent in Philadelphia, spring of 1919, investigating F. R. Welsh, with statement of expenses fully itemized in detail.

(8) Attach report of John B. Densmore on Immigration Service investigation at San Francisco, with full statement of expense thereof itemized in detail.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against the resolution that it is not a privileged resolution, in that, while purporting to call for facts, it calls for an expression of opinion. I call attention to figure 4, lines 19 and 20, on page 2, calling for "What activities, if any, are now being conducted in behalf of Thomas J. Mooney." Now, there may be a great many activities being conducted in behalf of Thomas J. Mooney that the Secretary of Labor has no knowledge or connection with, and in a privileged resolution the House is bound by the resolution. While the gentleman from Texas may have intended to inquire what activities were being conducted by the Department of Labor on behalf of Thomas J. Mooney, the inquiry in subparagraph 4 calls for activities in behalf of Thomas J. Mooney which are not limited in scope.

And furthermore, Mr. Speaker, it calls for an interpretation on the part of the Secretary of Labor as to what is the activity in behalf of Thomas J. Mooney. Of course, as the Chair well knows, the House has always been extremely careful in directing resolutions of inquiry to the executive departments. There are certain formulas which have been followed invariably, and it is very seldiom that the House in passing a House resolution departs from them. Now, the mere inclusion of the words "if any" would call, it would seem to me, for the exercise of the expression of opinion on the part of the Secretary of Labor, as, to wit, whether certain things were being done, whether they were an activity or whether they were not; and if he felt they were not an activity, of course he would not feel required to report them to the House.

I have no particular interest in the information or in the matter which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] seeks to acquire under this resolution, but I do think that if we were to pass a resolution upon this subject it certainly ought to be confined to the purposes and to the requirements of the rules of the House upon those matters.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard on the resolution before the Speaker rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, in reference to the point of order made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, in all of which I concur, I would like to call the attention of the Speaker to the fact that this resolution calls for an investigation. It has eight sections to it, and, as was said by the highest parliamentarian, I think, in the United States, the gentleman from Illinois, no resolution can be sent out as a dragnet. This resolution calls for a complete investigation, and the gentleman from Texas understands how to get an investigation in this House, which is by special committee. I would like to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that while there are eight different paragraphs to the resolution, the rule is that if any one of the sections in the resolution itself is subject to a point of order the whole resolution must fail.

Now, the resolution must call for facts and not opinions, as was stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]. Section 4 says:

What activities, if any, are now being conducted in behalf of Thomas J. Mooney?

That does not call for a fact. That calls for activities being carried on at the present time. And I would like to ask the Speaker or anyone else whether or not the qualification contained in that paragraph is a fact? I ask if the phrase, "What activities, if any," constitutes a fact? The resolution can only call for information on the fact in being, and that is shown in Third Hinds, 1892, as well as by the Manual, at the top of page 381.

Now, they mention here "the names of persons, stating in detail their activities." This is a set of resolutions covering a certain period of activities and calling for an investigation. An investigation is never had by a special rule of the House by resolutions, but the House has a well-defined way in which to provide for an investigation. And the gentleman knows how to proceed in that regard. I am not complaining about any investigations—this is a period of investigating—but to set out a dragnet, as was said by the gentleman from Illinois, is not permissible under a resolution, and there can not be a resolution of inquiry. It must be a simple resolution asking for facts.

And, again, it says:

What connection in behalf of the Department of Labor, if any?

That does not call for a fact. It calls for an investigation. They can not make an investigation out of this kind of a resolution. For that reason I think the resolution is subject to a point of order.

In section 4 it says:

What activities, if any, are now being conducted in behalf of Thomas J. Mooney?

Who by? By the Department of Justice? Thomas J. Mooney and his kin should be allowed to rest and not be brought into this House any more than should Debs or these other parties.

I think this resolution is not specific. It calls for an investigation. It asks for an opinion and does not ask for a fact, and for that reason is subject to a point of order.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the maintaining of the rules and practices of the House is really more important than is the resolution itself. Both of these gentlemen hop onto section 4 as being very defective. Of course, everybody who has been here much and has had anything to do with the parliamentary arguments in the House knows that all the Speakers have been very careful about keeping these resolutions within due bounds. Sometimes it is very hard to tell whether they are asking for an opinion—which, of course, is barred—or asking for facts. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] says an activity is not a fact. Well, if an activity is not a fact, what is an activity, and what is a fact?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It says, "what activities, if any." I say it is not a fact, because it leads him to determine his opinion.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No; it does not. It says "activities, if any."

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman from Missouri define an activity?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes. An activity is a line of action.

Mr. WALSH. And if it is used in an inquiry on the part of a House resolution it means what line of action, if any, is being conducted in behalf of Thomas J. Mooney.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Of course it does. Now, the objection——

Mr. WALSH. I dislike to disagree with the gentleman's opinion, but I think I have heard him make a ruling on this very phrase——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I always ruled out any shade of opinion that was ever asked for in one of these resolutions. You could address a resolution to the United States marshal here asking what activities were being exercised to catch a lot of burglars. Are they not facts? There are various ways of catching criminals. You want to know what he is doing, what kind of activity he is carrying on, or whether he is carrying on any. What harm does the putting in of the words "if any" do? It excuses the Secretary of Labor from making a report on section 4 if there are no activities going on in this Mooney case. He can say there are none just as easily as he can say there are some—a dozen, if there happens to be a dozen. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts, who is a crack parliamentarian, is splitting hairs on section 4.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] claims, it seems, that you can ask of these heads of departments but one question at one time. That is a nice how-de-do. [Laughter.] There are eight sections in this resolution, and each one asks for something that is not asked for in the other.

Whether the Secretary of Labor knows all these things or not I do not know, but this resolution simply seeks to find out.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes; in half a minute. All I am talking about is the technical right of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] to have his resolution voted on.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. May I call attention to sections 7 and 8, which call in form for original documents? They do not call for copies of documents, but they call for original reports made by certain officials, which we can not do, as I understand, under a House resolution. I understand we can only call for original documents from one of the department heads and take them out of his possession and out from under his control by a joint resolution.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, taking it for granted that the contention of the gentleman from Alabama is correct, it would be the easiest thing I know of to correct it by some amendment to furnish copies.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. May I ask the gentleman this question: Does not that take away from the resolution the privilege that it would otherwise have?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. In other words, it is an improper resolution. It is not privileged, because it calls for a thing to be done that you can not properly include in a House resolution.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know; but that is not the point. The gentleman from Texas, if he wants to, has a perfect right to call for an original document. It does not make any difference as to the technicality of it.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Can that be done in a House resolution?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why not?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. For the reason that it is not in parliamentary form.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It calls for facts.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. That is not a fact. It calls for a document. You might as well take away a ledger from the Department of State, or a charter, or a desk which is in their possession. We can not do it by a House resolution. We are going beyond our scope, and therefore it can not be privileged.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. You can ask for copies.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes; but it deprives the resolution of the quality of privilege.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not think so.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state whether or not, in his opinion, the language in line 6, page 2, "charged with and convicted for heinous crime in California," calls for an expression of opinion?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No. It assumes a fact; the resolution itself assumes, and correctly, that Mooney was "charged with and convicted of a heinous crime in California," to wit, murder.

Mr. WALSH. No. It calls for the names of persons who have been charged with or convicted of heinous crimes in California.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No; "the names of all persons who, under the direction of any branch of the Department of Labor"——

Mr. WALSH. "Who had anything to do with the investigation of Thomas J. Mooney, charged with and convicted for heinous crime in California." There is a comma after "Mooney," and I suppose it means persons charged with heinous crime in California.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Are not the names of people facts?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; but whether a crime is a heinous crime or not is a matter of opinion.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, murder is a heinous crime, is it not?

Mr. WALSH. Yes. Sometimes in some localities chicken stealing is.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It is made a felony in Missouri in the second instance. "The names of all persons who, under the direction of any branch of the Department of Labor, had anything to do with the investigation of Thomas J. Mooney, charged with and convicted for heinous crime in California." It does not do a thing on earth except ask for the names of the witnesses, and surely the names of people are facts. It does not make any difference what Mooney was charged with, so far as the parliamentary status of it is concerned.

Mr. UPSHAW. What does a fact look like?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What does a fact look like? Some do not look like anything and some look very large. [Laughter.]

Mr. UPSHAW. That is what I was trying to bring out.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Surely the getting of names of witnesses in the Mooney case simply calls for so many facts. There is no question about that part of the resolution. I think myself that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] ought to amend his paragraphs 7 and 8 by calling for copies. While this resolution contains eight different propositions, it seems to me nobody on earth except the gentleman from Massachusetts thinks that it is not right because it requires eight different things. It might require eighty. But in order to fix it right I would call for copies.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. They could all be stated without numbering them?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Of course. Nowhere in this paper is there a single request for an opinion from the Secretary of Labor or anybody else on the face of the earth.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Texas moved to discharge the committee.

Mr. BLANTON. If the Chair has any doubt on the question of the point of order raised, I would like to be heard on it.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman move to discharge the committee?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes. I move to discharge the committee.

The SPEAKER. The only points that the Chair cares to hear the gentleman on are whether No. 4 calls for facts, and the suggestion made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] that paragraphs 7 and 8 ought to call for copies instead of originals.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, on those two points the resolution, while it has eight subdivisions, is construed in its entirety as to all.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman need not discuss that question.

Mr. BLANTON. And it clearly shows to any ordinary mind that is not so technical as that of my good friend from Massachusetts, which is abnormally technical [laughter], that its purpose is to cover only the activities exerted by the Department of Labor. It is an inquiry directed to the Secretary of Labor with respect to matters pertaining to his department, and it would be surplusage to repeat in each subdivision the fact that it is applicable to the Department of Labor. That is indicated once in the beginning, and that would be inferred in the subsequent sections.

I call the attention of the Speaker to good pleading in court. The courts have held that it is surplusage to be compelled to set out in each separate paragraph all the matters which are clearly understood from preambles in the statement. So much for section 4, which merely asks what activities known to the Department of Labor are being conducted in behalf of this criminal.

The SPEAKER. It does not say the Department of Labor.

Mr. BLANTON. It does in two other places.

The SPEAKER. Of course, that is the only point the Chair is in doubt about.

Mr. BLANTON. In section 2 it says "any branch of the Department of Labor." In section 3 it says "the Department of Labor." Section 4 merely follows the preceding paragraphs. In other words, if it is so clear that the Secretary of Labor will understand what is meant, this document is good, and I do not see how any mind could misunderstand it. Can the Speaker say that the Secretary of Labor will not understand what this section 4 means? He would understand that it applies to the various branches of the Department of Labor. He could not go outside of his own department. He would not for one minute attempt to extend or apply it to any other branch of the Government, or to understand that it so applied.

Now, in so far as sections 7 and 8 are concerned, in all seriousness I want to suggest to the gentleman from Alabama, does he believe that the House of Representatives has not the inherent right, if it wants to, to inspect any document in any department of this Government? If it wants to see a document, it has the right to see the document itself. The House of Representatives acts independently of the Senate on many occasions with respect to certain inquiries.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I am glad to do so.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. These sections purpose to take away from the Department of Labor the physical possession of documents that properly belong in the Department of Labor under the law as it now exists. The law as passed by both Houses of Congress puts the possession of those documents in the Department of Labor.

Mr. BLANTON. What law is there that prevents the House of Representatives from calling for a document?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Let me finish what I am saying. The gentleman proposes to take away one or two of those documents by action of the House alone, to take them from the proper depository of the documents, made so by a law passed by both Houses of Congress. Now, will the gentleman permit me further——

Mr. BLANTON. I did not yield for a speech, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment. I want to reply to the gentleman from Alabama before I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The gentleman did not allow me to finish my question. He can not answer the question until he allows "the gentleman from Alabama" to be heard.

Mr. BLANTON. I courteously yielded to the gentleman from Alabama to ask me questions, but could not yield him time to make a speech.

The SPEAKER. Unless some authority is presented to the Chair, the gentleman need not discuss the question about the originals of the reports.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I gladly yield for a question.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman from Texas state whether or not in his opinion the language in line 23—

The purpose of such trip—

calls for the statement of a fact or the expression of an opinion?

Mr. BLANTON. It calls for a fact, Mr. Speaker, and I think I can convince the gentleman in a moment. The Department of Labor acts presumably upon authority. That authority can come from various sources. The President of the United States could direct the Secretary of Labor to do certain things. Pursuant to such instructions or requests from the President of the United States, the Secretary of Labor could carry out those instructions. The House of Representatives could call on the Secretary of Labor to do certain things. That would be a fact.

In response to this question the Secretary of Labor could say, "I did so-and-so at the behest of the President," or "I did it at the behest of the Senate," or "I did it at the behest of the House of Representatives," or "I did it upon the authority of an act of Congress," and cite Congress to the act giving him authority. Any one of these illustrations which I have given constitutes a fact and not an opinion.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. But, of course, in stating the purpose of a trip, which the gentleman calls for in subparagraph 5, the gentleman is not calling for the statement of a fact, but for the expression of the opinion of the party who may have ordered the trip.

Mr. BLANTON. I will gladly answer the gentleman. For instance, the facts will show that these three men hired an expensive, high-power automobile and paid an enormous sum per day for it and ran back and forth from San Francisco to Los Angeles, back and forth and forth and back, costing this Government hundreds of dollars. And incidentally the facts will show that instead of being engaged in a lawful purpose, one was arrested by the officers of the law for violating the law in particular. Now, I do not ask for an investigation, as stated by the gentleman from Michigan. No investigation is sought. It is merely to show to the Members of this House the facts, so that afterwards if they want to call for an investigation the House can do so; but God knows it is hard enough to get an investigation of this Labor Department, though needed badly. I have been trying for two months to get an investigation of the department presided over by Mr. Densmore, to show where the millions that have been spent by him went. I have in my pocket a little button that a Congressman gave me just a moment ago, and he stated to me that $75,000 of the people's money has been spent by Mr. Densmore to have hundreds of thousands of these little buttons manufactured, and they are still down there unused.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the subject.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. The gentleman will confine himself to the resolution.

Mr. BLANTON. I am not asking for any investigation. I am asking to have these facts placed before the Congress, hoping some day to get an investigation.

Mr. ASWELL. I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the resolution.

Mr. BLANTON. I simply ask for the reports of the activities of these men between San Francisco and Los Angeles and ask for an itemized statement of their expenses.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Would it not be better to ask for an investigation? I will admit that the House has the right to ask for a report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that that does not bear on the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not yield to the gentleman for that. The only purpose on earth of this resolution is to try to get certain facts before the House of Representatives, and if, in their judgment later on they desire to do so, they may call for an investigation.

Mr. VAILE. I would suggest to the gentleman that with the purpose of establishing a fact we prove the intent in criminal cases in court right along.

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly, the intent is proven like any other fact, and in regard to the Philadelphia matter, that is certainly a fact. This man Welsh sent me certain information, and therefore Densmore had to send men to Philadelphia to investigate Welsh.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must not discuss the merits of the case but the gentleman must confine himself to the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. I am asking the Secretary of Labor to send the report of these men in Philadelphia who investigated Mr. F. R. Welsh for six weeks and an itemized statement of their expenses there. Is not that a fact? This is Government money that has been spent, and there is nothing in any of these eight subdivisions in this resolution that does not call for a fact.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, just an observation upon the question raised by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] in respect to information asked for by sections 7 and 8. The clauses do not ask for the originals of these documents, and the presumption is that the department is asked for what the department has a lawful right to give. The law provides that all of the departments of the Government on proper request shall make certified copies of any reports or of any documents rightfully filed within the department, and that these copies of reports properly certified by the head of the department as such are accepted in any court of justice as the original. I take it that these clauses call for such a report as the department has a right to make and can make under the law.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, just for a moment——

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Alabama has any authority that the House has no right to demand original papers, the Chair will be very glad to hear him, but otherwise it seems to the Chair that that is a question of the merits of the resolution. It may possibly be unwise for the House to do that, but the Chair does not see that that affects the matter from a legal standpoint.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I have no desire to discuss this in order to hear myself talk, and if the Speaker has a conclusion about it I do not wish to say anything.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has expressed an opinion, and if the gentleman has anything to suggest to change that, he would be very glad to hear from him.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. This question is called up in the House suddenly, and manifestly I have not had time to investigate it and am unable to cite any precedents, if by "authority" the Speaker means decisions as a matter of parliamentary procedure. I have authority which I think I could cite which would by logical inference be applicable, but if the Speaker means parliamentary precedents I have nothing of the kind.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this: It may be unwise and improper for the House to demand these originals from the department, but that is not a question for the Chair to decide. That does not affect the legality of such a resolution, and all the Chair can decide is whether it is legal.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I think I could have presented my point of view in the time that has been taken up between the Speaker and myself in colloquy.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I merely want to call attention to this with reference to what the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] has said: This resolution calls in several of its subdivisions for "copies" of reports or documents. In subdivisions 7 and 8 it calls for "reports." Manifestly there is only one thing which is a report, and that is the original. It follows as a matter of course that if we ask for a report in the absence of anything to indicate the contrary we are asking for the original report and not a copy of the report. Especially does that implication obtain when there are subdivisions of this resolution which call for "copies" of papers. If copies only were asked for by these subdivisions 7 and 8, "copies" would be asked for. Therefore, taking the resolution as a whole, it seems clear to me that the original reports are demanded.

What I was going to say upon the main question is this: The acts of Congress make the Secretary of Labor the proper custodian of these reports that are called for here—that is, acts of Congress, not acts of the House or of the Senate, but of Congress as a whole. We propose by this resolution, if I interpret it correctly, to call for the original of these papers, to change those acts of Congress—to take away from that official who has under existing law the custody of the papers the right to retain them—and to place the papers elsewhere. They will not be returned to the Department of Labor, but they will be kept here and laid before the Speaker.

As I was saying, we do not propose to turn these papers back to the Department of Labor, where they properly belong, after inspecting them, but they are to be laid before the Speaker and to become a part of the archives of the House. Therefore we are changing the place of deposit from what it is under present law—the Department of Labor—to the archives of the House, and that is a change of law. That is the reason why the House can not by House action alone do this. A joint resolution, which is an act of Congress, can alone do this.

The resolution sought to be called up has privilege only if it seeks by a proper method to do a proper thing. It has no privilege if its object is improper—if it seeks to do something that the House can not lawfully do. Therefore I hold that the resolution has lost its quality of privilege because it would change existing law.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I will not take up the time of the House but a moment in regard to this point of order. I do not consider the matter sufficiently important to warrant taking up very much time. I do not think it will make very much difference to any of us whether or no the resolution passes, but I want to suggest to the Speaker this resolution certainly trenches on the border line, if it is not actually subject to the point of order made. It is a peculiarly worded affair. I think gentlemen are justified in saying that it calls for an investigation; it certainly calls for an opinion on the part of the Secretary as to the alleged information sought under several of the various heads of the resolution. The Secretary might find it very difficult to determine just what the alleged information was that was sought through the resolution. It offends the rule as generally construed in that it is a dragnet. Evidently whoever drew the resolution had some doubt whether or no the alleged facts sought to be described were in existence.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. I drew the resolution, and I know that the facts exist in each one of them. Well, does the gentleman think that is a fair argument to deliver on the floor of the House when a gentleman can not even answer a question?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Wyoming said at the very outset that he did not think it was very material or important from anybody's standpoint whether or no the resolution passes, whether or no these alleged facts were furnished. I do not think it is going to settle any important controversy one way or the other. If the gentleman knew these alleged facts existed, as he says he did, it should have been possible more clearly to describe them. It ought not to have been necessary to use such hazy and uncertain terms in the attempt to designate them or locate them or indicate what particular classes of facts were sought. A resolution of this kind may be privileged within the rules, but it is certainly on the border line, because it comes very near requiring the forming and expression of opinion. It is certainly a very broad and all-embracing dragnet, which a resolution of inquiry should not be to be privileged.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman a question or two. The effort to keep these resolutions within proper limits is more important than the essence of this resolution?

Mr. MONDELL. Very much more.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, what I want to ask the gentleman about is, really, is there in any one of these eight sections any effort to get the Secretary of Labor to express his opinion?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I should say that the resolution bristled with the effort.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Name one of the bristles, then. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I think I could name all of the paragraphs—all eight of them.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, let me ask a question about that.

Mr. MONDELL. More or less of that character. For instance, paragraph 4, referred to by the gentleman from Massachusetts, "What activities, if any, are now being conducted in behalf of Thomas Mooney." Conducted where? Who by?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why, by the Secretary of Labor or his agents.

Mr. MONDELL. The resolution says simply——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But you have got to construe the language in the light of ordinary common sense and practice.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, the honorable gentleman from Missouri who is now addressing the House as a Member perhaps is not bound to that closeness of reasoning which characterized him as a presiding officer. When the presiding officer of the House. I doubt if he would have said that the paragraph very clearly and unquestionably indicated its purpose.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, what is the matter with the paragraph?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, the matter with it is that it is all-embracing; it spans the heavens like a bow from one horizon to the other.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know; but any Member of the House has a perfect right to do that very thing if he wants to and if the House will coincide with him.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I think the gentleman will agree that the resolution would not be privileged if the paragraphs were all like this.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, why?

Mr. MONDELL. "What activities, if any, are now being conducted in behalf of Thomas J. Mooney?" Well, I assume a good many activities are being conducted on behalf of Mr. Mooney at one place and another, by one person and another.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will not the gentleman admit that on a reasonable construction of this resolution that it is to find out what activities the Secretary of Labor or any of his agents are using? And if there are none, as implied by the words "if any," why, all he has got to say is that there are none.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the vice of this resolution lies in the fact that, while possibly no particular paragraph of it offends the ordinary rule of construction which makes resolutions privileged, nearly all the paragraphs are questionable in their character; and a resolution of this kind is certainly, as I have said, on the border line in all of its paragraphs, if it does not in fact violate the rule in almost every one of them.

Now, here is a question about reports. We may assume that what is sought is a copy, but the resolution does not say so, and the resolution in failing to say so raises the question of what it is that the House seeks—an original or a copy. The very first paragraph calls for a copy of certain instructions that can be no better described, apparently, than by reference to a letter alleged to have been written by Mr. Densmore to the Secretary of Labor.

Paragraph 3 is not very clear as to its meaning and purpose and intent; and so on through. Paragraph 5 says:

> Attach copies of vouchers of McPherson, Kelly, and Kilmer for July, 1919, covering their trip from San Francisco to Los Angeles; the purpose of such trip and expense of same itemized.

That is rather hazy and uncertain. Evidently some one has an idea that certain gentlemen, surnamed McPherson, Kelly, and Kilmer, made a trip about a certain time in a certain direction. It is not very clear.

The sixth paragraph says:

> Attach copy of letter of instructions sent by John B. Densmore to H. L. Cobb after Cobb was sent to Texas on propaganda trip for Employment Bureau, and expense of trip itemized in detail.

Now, if there is a set of facts sought in connection with the activities of one Cobb, the existence of which facts are known, it ought to have been possible to have more definitely referred to them. And so on through the entire resolution. It is uncertain and hazy and questionable in every one of its paragraphs.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, might I direct the Speaker's attention to the language in line 23 on page 2, which says, "the purpose of such trip," and recall to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] a resolution offered during the Sixty-fourth Congress, directed to the Secretary of War, I think, with reference to expenditures for aeroplanes, in which the language used was "the purpose of such expenditures," and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] made the point of order that the resolution was not privileged because it called for the purpose of an expenditure made by the head of one of the executive departments, and that clearly the expression of purpose called for an expression of an opinion.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not remember that case, but even if it did, let us see whether "purpose" is a bad word or not.

The SPEAKER. Can the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] cite that case to the Chair?

Mr. WALSH. I do not have it before me, but I recall the point being made against the word "purpose" in a resolution, I think, directed to the Secretary of War, and the point being made by Mr. GARRETT, of Tennessee.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will ask the gentleman a question: Suppose a simple resolution asking the Secretary of Labor or anybody else for what purpose the Secretary of Labor, or Tom, Dick, or Harry took a trip to St. Louis, or ask the gentleman himself, for what purpose the gentleman went to Boston——

Mr. WALSH. That calls for a state of mind, what the man had in his mind, and not an existing fact. The purpose of this trip would not be stating a fact.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why is it not a fact? The gentleman from Massachusetts might go to Boston for a dozen different reasons or purposes. He might go there on this committee of which he is the head.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, yes; but the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] is here calling upon the Secretary of Labor to say what the purpose of a trip made by somebody else was.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know, but he was one of his agents.

Mr. WALSH. I know, but he could not state the intentions existing in the mind of one of his agents.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, the agent went at his solicitation if he went anywhere, or under his direction, and the United States Government paid the expenses of his trip, and whether it will do any man on the face of God's earth any good to find out how much he spent or what he spent it for I do not know; but if any Member wants to find out what the expense was and what the trip was made for, he has the right to know it.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the Speaker to the first paragraph, which says:

> That the Secretary of Labor be, and he is hereby, directed to report forthwith to the House of Representatives of the United States of America the following facts.

Now, if you leave out everything else except the eighth paragraph, which reads:

> Attach report of John B. Densmore on Immigration Service investigation at San Francisco, with full statement of expense thereof itemized in detail—

It seems to me the plain meaning of it would be that he would report the report, and therefore the construction as placed on it here, that he should transmit the original, is not justified. This resolution does not ask him to transmit it. It asks him to report the report, and that the reasonable meaning of these words is that he should report the contents of the report.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, just a moment, please. I want to call the Chair's attention to the ridiculous position in which some of the gentlemen would place the House; that is, the House by a proper vote could appoint a subcommittee and authorize that subcommittee to have any executive come before it and bring any document in his office, and yet the Members of the House will stand here on the floor and say that the House itself has not any authority to have documents brought before it. We can appoint a committee; we can delegate to a committee the above authority, to have their officers come before them and bring everything they have got in their departments, if necessary; swear them, put them under oath, and yet, having that power, we absolutely are without power in the House to have anything brought before the House itself. That is a ridiculous situation.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas loses sight of a very important factor of the situation. A pure resolution of inquiry is privileged. It gives an opportunity to the gentleman who offers it to discuss it and to bring it before the House. It is highly important that that privilege shall not be abused, and that the rules of the House shall not be so interpreted as to give any sort of a resolution which a gentleman may see fit to throw into the basket a privileged status.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that one of the haziest parts of the resolution is section 6, in which a demand is made for the letter of instructions sent by Mr. Densmore to Cobb after Cobb was sent to Texas. How long after? The heads of bureaus are no doubt sending letters of instruction frequently to those under their direction. Suppose Mr. Densmore had sent Cobb one yesterday? Now, it would be a matter of opinion on the part of Mr. Densmore as to what letter of instruction is asked for. The resolution calls for a letter written after Cobb was sent to Texas.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman from West Virginia one question.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Very well.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does he not suppose that Densmore, the very minute he lays his eyes on this resolution, will know what letters they are after?

Mr. REED of West Virginia. It will be a matter of opinion with him, will it not?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No; it is not a matter of opinion.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Suppose he has written several letters since Cobb was sent to Texas?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not know whether he ever wrote more than one, or whether he can write. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. It may be true, as the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] suggests, that it is not of great moment whether the House adopts this resolution or not, but the Chair thinks it is important that the Chair should, if possible, rule rightly, because it will make a precedent which will have an effect during the rest of this Congress, at least, if not in subsequent Congresses, and therefore the Chair is anxious to make a correct decision, no matter how important or unimportant it may be in this particular instance.

The Chair does not consider the merits of the resolution, or whether the House ought to adopt it without amendments or not, or whether the House ought to order a Secretary to send down any original documents. No authority has been cited to show that the House has not the right to order originals sent here. While it might be wise to amend the resolution, the Chair does not see how that question affects his decision.

These resolutions of inquiry are part of the privileges of the House. A resolution of inquiry is an engine which the House has to extort information from an administration, and it always indicates that the administration is unwilling to communicate certain facts which the House wishes to have; and so it seems to the Chair that the Chair ought, as a rule, in his decisions to lean in favor of the privileges of the House. The only privilege that this resolution has now is because the committee has failed to report it within seven days.

Now, the point of order which has been raised is that this resolution asks for an opinion rather than for facts.

The Chair thinks that while the language here and there throughout the resolution is inaccurate, as evidenced, for example, in the objection to section 6, to attach copies of letters sent "after Cobb was sent to Texas"—which is somewhat indefinite and vague—yet after all when the House asks for instructions from the department it is not presumed to know the exact facts and can not be precise in its averments, because otherwise there would be no reason for asking for the information, and therefore all that the House can do in the resolution is make its inquiry so definite that the department shall know what is intended and be able to determine whether the House is acting within its rights.

The only clause which gives the Chair any serious difficulty is clause 4. To clause 5, to be sure, the objection is made that the purpose of such a trip involves the expression of an opinion. But the Chair thinks it pretty clear that what is intended there is not the purpose in the mind of the man who made the trip, but the purpose of the department in sending him, and the Chair thinks that is a proper fact for Congress to ask for.

The fourth paragraph is "What activities, if any, are now being conducted in behalf of Thomas J. Mooney." That is vague. If it said, "What activities, if any, are now being conducted by the Department of Labor," the Chair thinks it would be very clear. But inasmuch as in the previous paragraphs it speaks of the activities of the Department of Labor, and inasmuch as the whole resolution is directed to the Department of Labor and the inquiry is made of that department, the Chair thinks it is not stretching the language but is a reasonable and fair interpretation to say that that means "what activities, if any, are now being conducted by the Department of Labor in behalf of Thomas J. Mooney"; and therefore the Chair overrules the point of order, and decides that the resolution is privileged.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to discharge the committee.

The SPEAKER. There is no need of that. It is neither debatable nor amendable. The question is on discharging the committee from further consideration of the resolution.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to amend the resolution, and I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Obviously there is not a quorum present.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

Mr. WALSH. We are not going to pass any more Mooney resolutions unless there is a quorum present.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 41 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, August 13, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting an estimate of appropriation for defraying the cost of transportation and subsistence to China of certain Chinese refugees from Mexico who have been under military jurisdiction since 1917 (H. Doc. No. 181); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting estimate of a deficiency in the appropriation for "Suppressing counterfeiting and other crimes," sundry civil act for the fiscal year 1920, and suggesting an amendatory clause (H. Doc. No. 182); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Acting President of the United States Civil Service Commission, transmitting report in response to House resolution No. 73 (H. Doc. No. 183); to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of communication from the acting chairman of the Federal Trade Commission submitting an estimate of appropriation for all expenses necessary in the collection of information as may be directed by the President of the United States or Congress regarding the production, ownership, manufacture, storage, and distribution of foodstuffs, or other necessaries, and the products or by-products in connection therewith, together with figures of cost and wholesale and retail prices (H. Doc. No. 184); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, August 13, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, let us find Thy divine favor as we face once more the tasks of the day. May we go through the duties of the day in the constant remembrance that Thou dost look upon us, that Thou hast an interest in the work that has been committed to our hands, and that Thou art willing to inspire us with divine wisdom. Do Thou help us in our tasks. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I have a letter from C. J. Harris, State secretary of the American Legion, South Dakota branch of American Veterans of the Great War, inclosing resolutions adopted at a recent State convention of that organization held at Sioux Falls July 14–15. I ask that the communication and resolutions be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the communication and resolutions were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE AMERICAN LEGION,
SOUTH DAKOTA BRANCH OF AMERICAN
VETERANS OF THE GREAT WAR,
Sioux Falls, S. Dak., August 2, 1919.

Hon. EDWARD JOHNSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. JOHNSON: The recent State convention of the American Legion of the department of South Dakota, in its first annual convention held in Sioux Falls, July 14–15, the inclosed resolutions were passed, and the secretary instructed to send a copy to you as a Representative in the Government, in Washington, from this State.

The American Legion, as you know, stands for policies beneficial to the people at large, and will expect of all Representatives that support.

Very truly, yours,

C. J. HARRIS, State Secretary.

Resolution regarding equality of disability pay to all officers or enlisted men of the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, where such disability was occasioned incident to service in the recent war with the Central Powers of Europe.

Whereas under the present laws and regulations there is discrimination in favor of certain persons who received injuries in the service in the war against the Central Powers of Europe, and this discrimination grants to persons subject to retirement as officers of the Regular Army having a file number with the War Department, contra distinction to members of the Officers' Reserve Corps, of the National Guard, and of the National Army, benefits in excess of the benefits, rights, and privileges granted to officers of the same length of service, whose service was in the Officers' Reserve Corps, National Guard, or National Army; and

Whereas the granting of such discrimination in favor of officers subject to retirement as officers in the Regular Army having a file number with the War Department, savors of class legislation; and

Whereas equal benefits were granted to all members of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps by the war-risk insurance act, and such benefits were granted regardless of vocation and previous training, and with the end in view of returning the individual if injured to his trade or vocation or of training such person for some equally lucrative employment: Be it

Resolved by this convention of the American Legion of the department of South Dakota, That the existing laws and regulations do unjustly and unwisely discriminate in favor of persons whose interest was no greater and whose service was of no greater benefit to the Nation, and that such discrimination has a tendency to place the several branches of our military service on different status, and by so doing causes friction and injustice; therefore be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to all Members of Congress from South Dakota with the recommendation that legislation placing all members of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps on an equal status regarding payments for disability or retirement on account of injuries received in the recent war.

Resolution calling attention of our congressional representation to H. R. 5545.

Whereas there has been introduced into the House of Congress as resolution 5545, providing for the building of homes, reclamation of lands, and other substantial aid to soldiers seeking to establish themselves in the world after discharge, and believing that the bill embodies legislation which will be of vast benefit to all ex-service men: Be it

Resolved, That the Members of Congress from South Dakota be furnished with a copy of this resolution with the request that they give this bill their best attention, interest, and consideration.

Resolution regarding war-risk insurance.

Whereas one of the primary purposes of this organization is to protect, assist, and promote the welfare of its members and of all persons in the military service of the United States and those dependent thereon; and

Whereas owing to the speedy demobilization of the men in the service and the impossibility of explaining to them their full rights and privileges under the war-risk insurance act, and to the fact that a large number of men are thereon daily losing said rights, benefits, and privileges, which may never be restored; and

Whereas it is desirable that every means be pursued to acquaint the men involved of their full rights and privileges and to prevent the loss of such rights: That it should be

Resolved, That this convention pledges its earnest support to the campaign of publicity and education in this connection in order that all men now acquainted with the rights and benefits accruing from a continuation of such insurance may take the proper steps for continuance or reinstatement, and that the executive committee be empowered to confer with the War Risk Bureau to insure the rights of all men now residents within this department; and be it further

Resolved, That the war-risk insurance act be so amended by Congress that the insured may be able to elect whether his insurance, upon maturity, shall be paid as an annuity or in one complete and full payment, and that the insured may select his beneficiaries regardless of relationship; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to each Member of Congress from South Dakota requesting their best interests in protecting the rights of all men now retaining their war-risk insurance.

Mr. CURTIS (for Mr. KEYES) presented petitions of sundry citizens of Hopkinton, Mason, Albany, and Raymond, all in the State of New Hampshire, praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Morgan City, La., praying for the continuance of the present zone system of postage rates, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of sundry postal clerks of Sioux Falls, S. Dak., and a petition of the Colorado State Association of the National Association of Letter Carriers, praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. CAPPER presented a petition of Local Union No. 880, International Association of Machinists, of Pittsburg, Kans., and a petition of the United Trades Council of Pittsburg, Kans., praying for Government ownership and control of railroads, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. FERNALD presented a petition of sundry citizens of Maine, praying for the repeal of the tax on soda water and ice cream, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. NEWBERRY presented a petition of the Michigan Hardwood Manufacturers' Association, praying for the return to private owners of the railroads of the country, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the Michigan Hardwood Manufacturers' Association, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Monroe, Mich., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation providing for Federal control of the meat-packing industry, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. MOSES. I present resolutions adopted at the annual convention of the New Hampshire Rural Letter Carriers' Association held at Charlestown, N. H., which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the present rate of compensation paid rural carriers is totally inadequate to meet the present high and ever-increasing cost of living and maintenance of equipment necessary to serve our routes: Therefore be it

Resolved by the New Hampshire Rural Letter Carriers' Association in convention assembled at Charlestown, N. H., June 28, 1919, That we hereby respectfully petition Congress that the following schedule of salary and allowance for maintenance of equipment be promulgated;

The salary for the first year after induction into service shall be $50 per mile or major fraction of 1 mile per annum, increasing 10 per cent per year for a period of five years; such percentage of increase to be retroactive from time of induction into the service; allowance for maintenance of equipment shall be $600 per annum for standard routes of 24 miles; such allowance to be increased or decreased $20 per mile for routes more or less than the standard; and

Whereas it is impossible to render satisfactory or regular service by horse-drawn vehicles on routes in excess of 30 miles in length, these long routes impairing the efficiency of the service; be it further

Resolved, That no rural routes shall be established that are more than 30 miles in length, and all routes more than 30 miles in length shall be reduced to 30 miles or less.

We further respectfully request that the law passed by Congress directing the department to compensate rural carriers for the handling of locked pouches on rural routes be made effective, so that carriers who are required to handle such pouch mail shall receive just remuneration for performing this extra service; and

Whereas the present practice of requiring rural letter carriers to deliver parcels-post and relay mail for city carriers has resulted in serious delay in the delivery and dispatch of the mail on their own routes, also working a hardship on carriers performing this extra duty: Therefore it is respectfully requested that the practice be prohibited; and

Whereas in the past many rural carriers have been unjustly removed from the service without any possible chance of redress: Therefore be it

Resolved, That a civil service court of appeals be instituted so that all civil service employees will have a chance to present their cases, thereby having a chance to receive just treatment.

Mr. MOSES presented a petition of sundry citizens of Lyme, N. H., and a petition of sundry citizens of Atkinson, N. H., praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. NELSON presented a petition of Local Branch, Railway Mail Association, of Albert Lea, Minn., praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of Local Grange No. 287, Patrons of Husbandry, of Clinton, Me., praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 2768) to authorize the disposition of certain grazing lands in the State of Utah, and for other purposes; and

A bill (S. 2769) to authorize the disposition of certain grazing lands in the State of Utah, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. ROBINSON:

A bill (S. 2770) authorizing local drainage districts to drain certain public lands in the State of Arkansas, counties of Mississippi and Poinsett, and subjecting said lands to taxation; and

A bill (S. 2771) granting to certain claimants the preferential right to purchase certain alleged public lands in the State of Arkansas, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. HARDING:

A bill (S. 2772) granting an increase of pension to George W. Pitner; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. NEWBERRY:

A bill (S. 2773) for the relief of Ethel Proctor; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 2774) granting an increase of pension to Alverton H. Town (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

RETURN OF THRACE TO GREECE.

Mr. KING. I offer the following resolution and ask that it be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I also ask that there be printed in the RECORD a portion of a telegram which I have received and which is signed by a number of individuals and organizations of Greeks residing in the United States. This telegram protests against the Greek nation being deprived of territory which, it is claimed, under the principle of self-determination and with a proper regard to the rights of nations, should be incorporated within the Kingdom of Greece.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are those American organizations?

Mr. KING. I understand that they are; otherwise I would not present the petition. My understanding is that the petition is signed by individuals, as well as by societies or organizations of Greeks who are residents of the United States. The organizations are American in character. I shall make further inquiry, and if I ascertain——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not understand how a man can be an American and a Greek citizen at the same time.

Mr. KING. I suppose that some of those who have signed this petition are in somewhat the same position as those American citizens who have made representations here and elsewhere concerning Ireland, and have asked that her people be given the right of self-determination. Such petitions were presented by loyal American citizens. I know that there are thousands and tens of thousands of American citizens of Greek birth and they are loyal to America and to our Government, but it is natural that they should have great solicitude for their fatherland.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair knows that the Senator from Utah wants to observe the rules and that is all that is required.

Mr. KING. I have made some inquiry and am satisfied that these societies under whose auspices the meeting referred to in the telegram was held are American organizations and that the members of the societies are American citizens.

The resolution (S. Res. 160) was referred to the Foreign Relations Committee, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that in the treaties of peace with Bulgaria and with Turkey, western or Bulgarian Thrace to the line of the Arda River and eastern or Turkish Thrace, including Adrianople, to the line from Enos on the Aegean Sea to Midia on the Black Sea, should be awarded to Greece, proper facilities for Bulgarian commerce to be reserved at Saloniki, Kavala, and Dedeagatch; and be it further

Resolved, That the residue of European Turkey, including Constantinople, the coasts of the Sea of Marmora and the Peninsula of Gallipoli should be constituted a free State under the protection of the league of nations.

Mr. KING subsequently said:

Mr. President, a moment ago I offered a telegram containing resolutions adopted at a meeting of certain societies held in Boston, Mass., on Sunday last. An inquiry was made by the Chair as to whether the organizations and societies were American in character. Upon further examination of the signatures of the telegram I find that among them are the names of distinguished American citizens. Mayor Peters, of Boston, is one who joined in the telegram. Also, the secretary of state of Massachusetts; Lieut. Col. Frank Perkins; Capt. Winifred MacBrayne, of the Aviation Corps; Dr. M. M. Eichler, director of the Zionist Bureau of America; Joseph Horton, principal of the schools of Ipswich, Mass.; Bishop Rodostolu Alexander, who signs for the Greek churches in America. The telegram is also signed by Sergt. H. Korgis, of Company L, Twenty-third Infantry, Second Division, and he signs as chairman of the delegates representing 65,000 American soldiers of Greek nationality. The petition also states that those signing are citizens of the United States.

I shall not ask that all of the names attached to the telegram be inserted in the RECORD. There are a few lines in the telegram referring to a matter not germane which I shall ask to have excised and not printed.

Mr. President, naturally those in our midst who came from Greece and are acquainted with her glorious past are anxious for her welfare and development, notwithstanding their allegiance to their adopted country. Thousands of Greeks have come to our shores, and we find them in all parts of this Republic. Many of them have become naturalized and are bearing with fidelity the responsibilities of American citizenship. I have found them to be industrious and frugal and earnest to become loyal, patriotic, and intelligent Americans.

It is natural that they should be proud of the historic record of the Grecian people and that in the liquidation of the war they should behold with more or less anxiety the dealings of the peace conference with Hellenic interests. They feel, as do most Americans, that Bulgaria entered the war for the purpose of territorial aggrandizement and to aid in crushing the other Balkan States. They feel, as I know most Americans feel, that Bulgaria must be dealt with at the peace conference as an enemy nation. Of course, that does not mean that she shall be treated other than in a fair and just manner. The Grecian people desire to realize a part at least of their national aspirations. Everyone admits that Greece, both directly and indirectly, contributed to the allied cause. Every effort was made by Germany and Austria to secure the support of the Grecian people for the cause of the Central Powers. The great statesman, Venizelos, rendered signal service to his country and to the allied nations in combating the intrigues and the sinister efforts of the Germans and Austrians to attach Greece to the cause of the Central Powers. I have sometimes felt that sufficient credit has not been given to Venizelos and to the Greek people for their contribution to the success of the associated and allied powers. Bulgaria is attempting, notwithstanding her defeat, to impose the terms of a conqueror. She is seeking territory which should, in the readjustment of national lines, go to Greece, and I sincerely hope that the peace conference at Paris will see that the rights of Greece are protected.

I hope that the Foreign Relations Committee will promptly report, with a favorable recommendation, the resolution which I have just offered.

BOSTON, Mass., August 11, 1919.

Senator KING,
Washington, D. C.

The delegates of 126 Greek communities and 56 societies in the United States, and American-born citizens, assembled Sunday, August 10, in Mechanics' Building in Boston, resolve that—

"Whereas the Great War has been fought to establish justice and the principle of self-determination;

"Whereas we have pledged our honor that we will apply justice to all races;

"Whereas the Greeks have a just and valid claim to Thrace, to Northern Epirus, to the 12 islands of the Aegean, and Western Asia Minor on principle of nationality as admitted by all delegates at peace conference;

"Whereas the claims advanced by the Bulgarians upon Thrace are based only upon economic considerations;

"Whereas the Bulgarians have in the past demonstrated their inability to govern non-Bulgarian races in justice, and have perpetrated horrible crimes against Greeks, Serbians, Turks, and humanity at large;

"Whereas Greece has shown her capacity for governing equitably non-Hellenic races;

"Whereas for the Greek nation the question of Thrace is one of vital importance, and unless solved justly will drive the Greek people to desperation to go to war against Bulgaria in order to liberate the Province: Now therefore we American citizens, native born and of Greek descent, friends of the Greek nation, as well as of all nations subscribers to the principle of self-determination, convinced of the right of the Greek cause and believing that no other solution but a just one on principle of nationality will bring peace in the Balkans, respectfully represent to Senators LODGE, BRANDEGEE, KING, and MOSES our desire that justice be done to the Greek race, that Thrace and Northern Epirus and the islands be united with the free kingdom of Greece in order that the universal sentiment for Greece in America be not shocked by the surrender of purely Greek populations to our enemies,

"Resolved, That a vote of thanks be addressed to the entire press of the United States for the warm support it has given to the just cause of the Greek nation.

"Resolved, That a vote of thanks be addressed to Senators LODGE, BRANDEGEE, KING, and MOSES for the stand they have taken in defending the just cause of Greece before the Senate of the United States of America.

"Resolved, That a special vote of thanks be addressed to the New York Times, Herald, Tribune, World, Chicago Tribune, News, Post, Journal, Springfield Republican, Philadelphia Ledger, Washington Post, Kansas City Star, Boston Transcript, Herald, Globe, Post, Christian Science Monitor for their impartial presentation of Greek questions before the just tribunal of the American people.

"Committee chairman, Albert Langtry, Secretary Commonwealth Massachusetts; Sergt. H. Korgis (who captured 256 Germans, Company L, Twenty-third Infantry, Second Division), chairman delegates behalf 65,000 Greek American soldiers; Mayor Peters, Boston; Lieut. Col. Frank Perkins; Capt. Winifred MacBrayne, Aviation Corps; Dr. Chas. Fleischer; Miran Sevasly, Director Armenian Union America; Dr. M. M. Eichler, director Zionist Bureau America; William Flatmayer, Taunton, Mass.; Joseph Horton, principal schools, Ipswich, Mass.; Bishop Rodostolou Alexander, for Greek churches America; and many others."

CHARLESTON (S. C.) NAVY YARD EMPLOYEES.

Mr. FERNALD. I ask unanimous consent to call up from the calendar the bill (H. R. 6323) for the relief of contractors and subcontractors for the post offices and other buildings and work under the supervision of the Treasury Department, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Before that bill is taken up I should like to ask if the morning business has been closed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has not formally been so announced.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It will take me just a moment to state the reason why I made the inquiry. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to a matter and make some inquiry of the proper committee, if the Senator from Maine will permit me. It will take only a moment.

Mr. FERNALD. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I wish to call attention to a letter I have received from a gentleman connected with the navy yard at Charleston, S. C. He complains of the fact that the regular employees are being laid off on account of a lack of funds, while the temporary employees are being kept on the work, and he wants to know if it was really the policy of Congress to keep the temporary war workers on who have a civil-service status, while the old regular employees, who were there previous to the war and who have been doing the work, are being laid off.

With the permission of the Senator from Maine I should like to read a few paragraphs from this letter. The writer says:

> Permit me to bring to your attention a condition existing at the navy yard here that probably does not have its analogy in any other country in the world, certainly not in any commercial enterprise, namely, the laying off without pay experienced and necessary employees because of the "lack of funds" and at the same time retaining with pay temporary employees who can not possibly perform their ordinary duties because those who guide and direct their work are absent.
>
> Certain work of the Government always has been done by classified employees, who must first show their fitness for the numerous positions by taking and passing a civil-service examination.
> For years prior to the war this work at our yard has been performed by the class of employees above mentioned. The war naturally increased the work, temporary civil-service clerks were employed, and at the same time the Navy Department enlisted reservists (yeomen and yeomen (f)), placing them in the offices at desks where they became assistants to and worked under the clerks already so employed.

The letter goes on and shows that this temporary army of clerks have been provided for by an appropriation, while the regular clerks did the work upon which the temporary clerks were dependent, and now the permanent employees are being laid off while the temporary employees are kept there without any work to do.

I invite the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs to this matter. I should like to introduce this letter and have it referred to that committee and have the chairman make a report upon the conditions, so that we may clearly understand the facts in the case.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, as far as I know that is a matter which is left entirely in the hands of the Navy Department. I think it is permitted by law. I do not know the condition at this time, but if the Senator thinks it should be investigated and will introduce a proper resolution, we will look into the matter.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I will state the reason why I called attention to it, with the permission of the Senator from Maine. It seems to me it is a matter about which an explanation could be given by the committee without any further investigation, so that I might inform my constituents just the reason why the permanent employees are being laid off without pay while the temporary employees are kept in employment.

Mr. PAGE. I can not answer, except to say that I understand it is the policy of the department—why I do not know. It is a matter entirely in their hands.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Then I will content myself by saying that I will introduce at the proper time in the near future a resolution asking for this information, so that the public may be informed.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I was just going to make that suggestion, because I believe the Senator from South Carolina is absolutely right in endeavoring to place this information before the Senate. If it requires a resolution, I hope the Senator will not delay in introducing it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The letter will be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR NAVAL CONSTRUCTION.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator from Maine yield to me for a moment?

Mr. FERNALD. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs a question. I am also a member of the committee, but I want a little information. I noticed in several publications yesterday and the day before that one of the officials in the Navy Department indicated that $100,000,000 more were required by the Navy Department for construction and other work, and the intimation was that if it was not appropriated there would be a deficit of $100,000,000. I want to ask the Senator from Vermont, the chairman of the committee, whether there has any intimation gone forth from the committee that they will tolerate the expenditure of money by the Navy Department which has not been appropriated or that they will ratify or confirm any act of the Navy Department in creating a deficit of $100,000,000.

Mr. PAGE. I think the Senator from Utah knows as well as anyone that no expenditure of that character would be tolerated without a full and careful consideration of the reasons for such an expenditure.

Mr. KING. I suggest, in the light of the rather positive statement made by the newspapers—and they seem to have spoken after consultation with one of the officials of the Navy Department—that the chairman of the committee advise that department that if there are deficiencies there is a penal statute, and a penal statute will be invoked against those who create great deficiencies.

Mr. President, speaking as one man, I am getting tired of these enormous deficiencies. After full consideration Congress determines what shall be granted to a department or to a bureau, and the officials in the department or in the bureau pay no attention whatever to the limitations placed upon them, and they incur expenditures of hundreds of thousands and tens of millions of dollars and come here with the greatest brazenry and effrontery and demand that Congress shall make appropriations to cover these deficiencies. It is about time some of these officials should be advised that they are not this Government; that they are executive officers, and they can not transcend the authority which is conferred upon them.

Mr. PAGE. The Senator from Utah, who is a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, did his share, I judge, toward the formulation of the bill approved by the Naval Committee and by Congress. I do not know of any reason for assuming that the department will take any action that is not warranted by law. If there is any expenditure that does not come within the appropriation, I know the Senator from Utah will call it to the attention of the committee, and I shall be glad to act with him in any way he thinks advisable in ascertaining the facts. I do not think we need to rely too much upon what we see in the newspapers.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 6323. Is there objection?

Mr. THOMAS. Will the Senator from Maine yield to me for a moment?

Mr. FERNALD. I yield to the Senator.

EXTRA PAY TO DISCHARGED SOLDIERS.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, a few days ago I received a letter signed by a number of gentlemen as ex-soldiers, inquiring why I opposed the idea of a six months' bonus to the American Expeditionary Forces. I answered that letter on the 12th instant, and inasmuch as I am in receipt of other similar communications I ask leave to have inserted in the RECORD, without reading, the letter referred to and my answer to it. I thank the Senator from Maine.

There being no objection, the letters referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK CITY, August 2, 1919.

Senator THOMAS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We, the undersigned, all honorably discharged soldiers of the United States Army, noticing your antagonistic attitude toward the appeal the Senator from New York State, our representative, yesterday laid before the Senate, wish to inquire why you do not favor the proposed bill.

You no doubt are acquainted with the fact that if Germany had won the late war you would be forced to accept the terms she would have demanded. In that event the entire population of the United States would have been forced not only to pay Germany a great deal more than $1,000,000,000 but to give up our hard-earned liberty, which your and our forefathers fought so gallantly for.

While we were away those who stayed at home doubled and tripled their income, and if they happened to be exceptionally keen-sighted, amassed a fortune that will last them their entire life without having to expose themselves to death while doing so. We had to obey the command of our Government, even to the extent of forfeiting our life, without the prospect of a fortune lying before us. Surely they are willing that we at least be recompensed for the time that we lost while at the Government's disposal. The cost to them can be greatly lessened if you and your coherents will investigate the different camps and Government-owned storehouses, ascertain the amount of surplus supplies and dispose of them to the common people in this country at a fair price, so that they may save, and help stop speculators' profiteering, and then apply this money to a soldiers' fund.

One of the undersigned knows of one camp within 50 miles of Washington where a large accumulation of motor trucks are being allowed to stand out in the open rotting and rusting away from unuse and inattention. The money derived from the sale of these trucks alone would more than pay half of the entire emergency army a bonus of six months' pay.

We understand fully the immense volume of work that the present session of Congress have to handle, but we think that they can pause a moment or so in order to show their appreciation of a job well done and act upon both Senator CALDER's and Representative LAGUARDIA's appeal immediately.

Very truly, yours,

Henry F. McCann, Joseph A. Keelan, Joseph Demarest, George S. Basch, Frank Long, Otto W. Dahl, Edw. Baumgart, Donald Hanna, Charles M. Carlson, Thomas F. Wallace, William Bohrer, jr., Joseph J. Moeller, George Boetsch, Frank A. Rudolf, Fred E. Roediger, Leo M. Rogers, ex-soldiers, at present Sonora employees.

AUGUST 12, 1919.

HENRY F. MCCANN, Esq.,
1293 Second Avenue, New York City.

GENTLEMEN: In briefly acknowledging the receipt of your letter of the 2d instant, inquiring why I do not favor a bill for the payment of a bonus of $180 each to the soldiers of the United States engaged in the war with Germany, I promised as soon as opportunity permitted to answer you to the best of my ability. This promise I shall now fulfill.

The proposal, if I correctly understand it, is that the Government shall give to its soldiers a bonus equivalent to six months' pay while in the active service in recognition of its obligation to them for the successful performance of a supreme public duty.

My objections are:

First. The bill commercializes patriotism, impairs the sentiment of loyalty, and reduces to terms of money the service and sacrifice of the citizen for the public weal.

Every man in the United States is the possessor of certain rights which are reciprocal with certain duties or responsibilities. His enjoyment of the one is inseparable from his recognition of the other. The ultimate sanction of society, whatever the form of its government, is force, whose final analysis is the soldier in the ranks. The obligation to serve when the occasion arises is insistent and inexorable. Because of it you possess individual freedom, the right of initiative, the companionship of family and friends, the enjoyment of property, and the right to its lawful accumulation. Without the protection of a government guaranteeing these things they would perish, either by foreign aggression or domestic violence, or both. When threatened or assailed the government summons the citizen to its defense, and he must respond. In doing so he recognizes an obligation and pays a debt he owes to society. Its discharge is beyond price, as every patriotic, intelligent, and thoughtful man will at once admit. The soldier, it is true, receives and deserves a stipend sufficient for his needs, and properly requires his government to furnish him during service with arms, ammunition, clothing, provisions, and shelter. He also has the right to insist that the public shall care for those dependent upon him while he is performing such service.

It is evident that this service can not be measured in money. It is beyond price; it is sacred; it incarnates sacrifice. It is above and beyond the sordid standards of the workaday world. The attempt to apply them not only fails, but fastens upon that service the reproach that its impulses and its purposes were mercenary. There have been soldiers of fortune in the world, and armies have been composed of them, but never for a republic. Until Rome became an empire her legions were her pride and glory. When the republic became an empire these selfsame legions were transformed into the retainers of her emperors. These they finally dictated and then abandoned her to her fate.

There are, of course, exceptions to the principle. The family of the citizen serving in the ranks who loses life, and he who loses limb or bodily health in the performance of duty, must be cared for out of the public treasury. That condition is the genesis of the pension, and it was a sorry day for the Nation when that principle was abandoned at the demand of the Grand Army of the Republic and the present system substituted for it. The mad rush for pensions has dragged its glorious record in the mire, and in these days deserters and those dishonorably discharged are not only permitted but encouraged to apply for the correction of their records that they may share the spoils with those who fought the good fight. You will not approve that any more than I, but the disgraceful fact is there.

Another duty of the citizen is the payment of taxes for the actual needs of the Government. Just at present this is a pretty severe test of his loyalty, for he is paying them as he never paid them before, and he has a right to demand that the proceeds be applied as frugally as possible to the tremendous but imperative needs of public administration. We are raising $6,000,000,000 annually in this manner, or about half of what we are spending. This deficit we must make good, and we can do this only by taxation. Candidly, do you not think the taxpayer did something toward the war and that it is hardly fair to bankrupt him if we can avoid it?

You have performed a great work. Posterity will bless you for it. The country honors you for it. But you have performed a duty, recognized an obligation, and discharged a great sacred trust. There is the record. May it never be measured in terms of trade.

Second. The Government has voluntarily done and is doing more for its soldiers than ever before, and possibly more than it can afford. At the outset it doubled his pay. It then provided a system of war-risk insurance which its creators and advocates declared to be far better than and designed to take the place of a pension system. It was only upon that assurance that it was enacted, and even then some of us were inconsiderate enough to predict that after the war we would have both the insurance and the pension—a prediction which is being verified. We have given one bonus of $60 per soldier, equivalent to $250,000,000, and are devising a system of land allotments which assures a freeholder's place in the country to every soldier desiring to avail himself of it. I believe this should be done, but to be perfectly frank I must add that my principal motive is to secure the distribution of all public lands among the people as soon as possible. It is better for them, as it is infinitely better for the Government. Moreover, this enterprise requires a very considerable appropriation of money, although it adds very largely to the taxable wealth of the Nation, thus balancing the outlay. And it will serve to anchor the soldier to the soil. More than this we should not do.

Third. The bonus in question will be expended as easy money always is, and will be inevitably followed by demands for another and then another. The $60 bonus led to the movement for this one; the next will carry twice as much. The reasons for the first, if of any merit, are quite as convincing for all successive ones. And why should they not continue, once the practice begins? The politician, anxious for the soldier vote; demagogue, working on human cupidity; and the man coveting other appropriations for other purposes may always be depended upon "to start the fire and keep it burning." "Corn and the circus" became the cry of the Roman plebs once its appetite for them had been aroused, and the cry, we may be sure, was always heeded, though Rome perished in the end.

Fourth. The bonus is for every man, although the ostensible need for it is limited. There are countless thousands among you who are far removed from need. They are the majority. But very few are without means of support, and there is plenty of real work—not sinecures—for all who will work. Why should an overtaxed people be required to have their sorely needed revenues distributed among the well-to-do of the land? Are taxes levied in this country for such a purpose? Surely you will not, upon reflection, so contend.

Fifth. Every man and woman who worked in the Red Cross and other relief associations; in the hospitals, in the factories, in the mines, on the farms, and in selling bonds during the war, was serving the Nation. There were millions of them. Is there any reason why they should not have their bonuses, too, if bonuses are the order of the day? They were not in the trenches, neither were 65 per cent of the American Expeditionary Forces. Many of them were getting good wages, some of them only fair wages, some of them no wages. Why exclude them? Nay, why not bonus the poor old taxpayer himself? He certainly helped win the war, for without him you could not have been munitioned, nor clothed, nor fed. My dear sir, when a nation goes into the bounty business you can not draw the line. The civil-service employees are to-day clamoring for pensions. They say with much justice that they are as much entitled to them as are those of the military service, and we can not answer that claim. The Nation can not stand the added burden of this proposed bonus. If it were the only added charge we are asked to impose upon the Treasury it would be serious enough, but it is one of many. The railroad brotherhoods are demanding an additional $800,000,000, and we must provide not less than the sum of $1,000,000,000 for our guaranty of $2.26 wheat to the farmers. Education is clamoring for $100,000,000, and the civil employees want their wages raised to the absorption of as much more. The War Risk Bureau spends money as fast as we can supply it, to say nothing of "vocational education," pension increases, and scores of other claims which a good-natured Congress treats with favorable unconcern, and few of which should be considered at all. You gentlemen have helped win the war that America might continue her stately progress undisturbed by the enemies threatening her institutions. Surely you do not want to bankrupt what you have saved!

Sixth. The Government exists for the people, not the people for the Government. Yet we are fast reversing this principle. We are more and more regarding it as some great superinstitution of which we are the children that it is bound to feed, clothe, and support us, supply us with funds from an inexhaustible Treasury, nurse us when sick, and that we should depend on it for everything—from the cradle to the grave. That is paternalism, pure and undefiled. It undermines the integrity of the citizen, destroys his initiative and self-reliance, and will finally reduce the Government to hopeless impotency. The process has been going on ever since the Civil War; so it is not surprising that the average man is now demanding that the Government support him instead of his aiding to support the Government. Its founders had no such delusions. Hence their greatness and the greatness of the Nation they created. So much for my objections.

Coming now to the recital of your letter. You tell me that had Germany won the war we would have lost our liberty and been compelled to pay her not less than a billion dollars of indemnity. Quite true; but how does that affect the question? If a burglar attacks my father's home and I kill him, must the old gentleman give me what the burglar would otherwise have appropriated had he killed me instead?

It is true that some, but by no means all, of those who stayed at home doubled and trebled their incomes. But their expenses always kept pace with their incomes, to say nothing of the tax which the Government has imposed upon them and from which you are largely, if not wholly, exempt. I know the Government has a surplus of nearly everything for which it paid billions, but they were secured to equip you and hasten, regardless of cost, the successful ending of the war. It is selling them as fast as it can, and using the money, as it should, to pay, in part, the appalling debt which its people are carrying.

I do not doubt your assertion regarding an accumulation of Army trucks, but who will buy them? And who will pay $320,000,000 for what cost much less? They would have to produce that amount to "more than half pay the Army bonus," for the emergency Army to which you refer includes every man who wore the Army or the Navy uniform.

I know that certain newspaper men, some of whom made your job as difficult as possible while you were performing it, are now clamoring for the bonus, and that men anxious for your votes will support this demand, but I can not, under my conception of duty, take any part in its promotion. My son, who won his wings in the Aviation Service, but who for lack of orders could not go to France, though anxious to do so, would spurn the idea of a "bonus" for doing his duty to his country, as I am sure would thousands of others who also served in the hour of need.

I am not at all in accord with the view that we shall hereafter live in freedom from wars and conflict, but I am sure that if this war is to be followed by opening the National Treasury to demands like this, as now seems unfortunately probable, we shall live at peace with other nations for the very good reason that we can not fight them, whatever their conduct. We will have no money, no credit, and consequently no Army.

Very sincerely, yours,

C. S. THOMAS.

REDUCTION OF CURRENCY IN CIRCULATION.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, on August 8 the chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, Gov. Harding, made a reply to Senate resolution 142 relative to the gradual reduction of currency in circulation in the United States. It is a very important communication and explains the reason why no legislation at this time is necessary with regard to the currency. It shows that in April, 1917, the per capita circulation outside of Federal reserve banks and Federal reserve agencies and the Treasury of the United States was $37.88 and on August 1, 1919, it was $45.16.

There has been an expansion of the circulation to a larger amount than that, but the currency is in the hands of Federal reserve agents and in the hands of Federal reserve banks and is not in circulation. For instance, there have been sequestered over $850,000,000 of gold certificates in the hands of the Federal reserve agents against the issue of a like amount of Federal reserve notes. The Federal reserve notes, being constantly subject to daily redemption in gold, are being retired every day, and this process would retire the entire system of Federal reserve notes, except that as commerce demands additional currency like notes are issued and find their way into circulation. The Federal system is such, therefore, that there is no possibility of expanding the Federal reserve notes beyond the needs of our commerce.

The letter is of such importance and so convincing that I think it ought to go into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I emphatically agree with Gov. Harding that the high cost of living needs to be abated by diligent and efficient labor, by thrift, avoidance of waste and extravagance. Private monopolies should be controlled and profits restricted to a rate that shall be fair to the consumers. If restraint of trade be unlawful when "unreasonable," Congress should provide a means of determining when the restraint is "unreasonable" and fix the rates of profits at "reasonable" figures. I should favor generous rules on this line. I request that Gov. Harding's letter be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AUGUST 8, 1919.

Hon. GEORGE P. MCLEAN,
Chairman Committee on Banking and Currency,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Federal Reserve Board acknowledges receipt of your letter of the 5th instant asking for an expression of its views as to the advisability of legislation providing for the gradual reduction of the currency in circulation as proposed by Senate resolution 142.

The board would suggest that in determining whether or not legislation is necessary or desirable to regulate the volume of currency in circulation, consideration be given to the various forms of money which make up the sum total of our volume of currency. A distinction should also be drawn between the stock of money in the country and the amount actually in circulation.

With respect to gold coin, gold certificates, standard silver dollars, silver certificates, subsidiary silver, and Treasury notes of 1890, the board assumes that it is recognized that no legislation is necessary.

The United States notes, or legal tenders, which have remained at the fixed amount of $346,681,016 since March 31, 1878, have not been a disturbing factor since the passage of the act of March 14, 1900. An adequate gold reserve of more than 45 per cent is now held against these notes, most of which are in the form of small bills of $1, $2, and $5 denominations. Notes of these denominations are needed in the daily transactions of the public, and were the United States notes to be retired the issue of an equal volume of small bills in some other form of currency would be necessary. To effect the retirement of the United States notes, funds would have to be withdrawn from the Treasury to be supplied either by taxation or by the sale of interest-bearing obligations. The board does not believe that any legislation with respect to United States notes is necessary or desirable at this time.

The national bank notes outstanding on August 1, 1919, amounted to $658,118,555, a reduction of nearly $60,000,000 since Juy 1, 1914. The greater part of these notes is secured by United States 2 per cent bonds, and provision has already been made in section 18 of the Federal reserve act for their gradual retirement.

Federal reserve bank notes, which are secured by United States obligations and are taxed just as national bank notes are, have been issued only to replace in part national bank notes retired and standard silver dollars melted or broken up and sold as bullion under authority of the act of April 23, 1918, known as the Pittman Act. The issue of these notes has, therefore, brought about no increase in the circulating medium.

The amount of Federal reserve notes outstanding has increased from $357,239,000 on April 1, 1917, to $2,504,753,000 on August 1, 1919. It appears, therefore, that those who see in the larger volume of circulation in the United States the prime cause of increased costs of living and who seek a remedy by a forced contraction of the currency must have in mind the Federal reserve notes and section 16 of the Federal reserve act, as amended June 21, 1917, which provides for its issue and redemption.

In analyzing our present monetary situation and in considering the causes which have led to the expansion of credits and note issues during the war, we should not lose sight of some of the developments of the prewar period and of their effect upon credits and prices. Very heavy purchases of supplies of all kinds were made in this country by European belligerents during the years 1915 and 1916, payment for which involved the shipment to us of large amounts of gold. The stock of gold in the United States on July 1, 1914, was $1,890,678,304. This amount increased steadily until April, 1917, the date of our own entry into the war, when it reached $3,088,904,808, an increase of about $1,200,000,000. Bank deposits likewise show a large increase, the net deposits of national banks having risen from $7,485,149,000 on June 30, 1914, to $10,489,217,000 on March 5, 1917, while the net deposits of all banks in the United States increased from $17,966,150,000 in June, 1914, to $24,891,218,000 in June, 1917. Net deposits of national banks had further increased up to May 12, 1919, to $11,718,095,000, and those of all banks in June, 1918—the latest date for which figures are available—to $26,769,546,000. Shortly after April 6, 1917, when the Congress declared war, the Treasury began to sell bonds, notes, and certificates in large amounts, resulting in a net increase in the public debt to August 1, 1919, of $24,518,064,840.

On July 1, 1914, the total stock of money in the United States, exclusive of that held by the United States Treasury, was $3,419,168,368. On April 1, 1917, the stock of money, estimated on the same basis, was $4,702,130,941, an increase of $1,282,962,573, of which increase $883,481,028 was in gold.

On July 1, 1914, there were no Federal reserve notes in existence, while on April 1, 1917, there were outstanding $357,239,000.

The amendment to the Federal reserve act approved June 21, 1917, changed substantially the original reserve requirements for member banks and provided that their entire lawful reserve should be carried with the Federal reserve banks. The same amendment authorized the Federal reserve banks to exchange Federal reserve notes for gold. The result of these two changes in the law was to transfer immediately large sums of gold from the vaults of the member and nonmember banks and from general circulation to the Federal reserve banks, and this caused a change in the methods of accounting for gold by the Federal reserve banks and Federal reserve agents.

In order to avoid confusion in determining the volume of money in actual circulation, it is necessary to distinguish between tables showing the total stock of money in the country and tables showing the circulation outside of the Treasury and Federal reserve agents' vaults and to limit our view to amounts held by member and nonmember banks and the public, which are exclusive of amounts on hand at Federal reserve banks, held by Federal reserve agents, and held in the Treasury.

The reserve money held by or for the Federal reserve banks serves, of course, as a basis for credit, but it forms no part of the currency in circulation. Upon this basis, the amount of money in circulation on July 1, 1914—there being no Federal reserve banks in operation at that time—was $3,419,168,368, made up as follows: Gold coin and certificates, $1,649,775,803; silver dollars and silver certificates, including Treasury notes of 1890, $552,203,610; all other currency, $1,217,188,955; being circulation per capita, $34.53.

The corresponding amounts of money in circulation on April 1, 1917, December 1, 1918, and August 1, 1919, are shown in the following table:

Amount of money outside the Treasury and Federal reserve banks.

	Apr. 1, 1917.	Dec. 1, 1918.	Aug. 1, 1919.
Gold coin and certificates	$1,989,152,000	$861,245,000	$728,046,000
Silver dollars and silver certificates (including Treasury notes of 1890)	532,700,000	372,489,000	241,505,000
Federal reserve notes	357,239,000	2,607,445,000	2,504,753,000
Federal reserve bank notes	3,170,000	87,737,000	166,289,000
All other currency	1,218,715,000	1,201,069,000	1,156,297,000
Total	4,100,976,000	5,129,985,000	4,796,890,000
Amount per capita outside the Treasury and the Federal reserve banks	37.88	48.13	45.16

Assuming that the date December 1, 1918, marks the beginning of the post-war period, the table shows changes during this period up to August 1, 1919, as follows: Gold coin and certificates in circulation decreased $133,199,000; silver dollars and silver certificates, including Treasury notes of 1890, decreased $130,984,000; Federal reserve notes decreased $102,692,000; Federal reserve bank notes increased $78,552,000; all other currency decreased $44,772,000, being a net decrease in circulation for the post-war period of $333,095,000, or $2.97 per capita.

In considering the question of currency in circulation, there should be taken into account the various factors which have entered into the demand for currency, among which are: The gradual enlargement of pay rolls, both as to the number of workers and amount paid to each; the effect of higher wages upon deposits in banks and upon the amounts of money carried by shopkeepers in their tills and by individuals in their pockets; the amounts of money locked up or carried on their persons by workmen who have been receiving high wages and who, especially in the case of ignorant foreigners, are unwilling to deposit their savings in banks or to invest in Government bonds; the amount of money carried away by workmen returning to their homes in foreign countries; and the fact that the circulating media of the Philippine Islands, Hawaii, Cuba, Porto Rico, Santo Domingo, Haiti, Honduras, Panama, and, in part, Mexico include United States paper currency and subsidiary silver. The amounts required in these countries, most of which are very prosperous, have greatly increased in the last few years. The total foreign circulation of United States currency can not be stated accurately, but is estimated to be at least $150,000,000.

The difficuly, indeed the impossibility, of keeping in circulation an excessive volume of Federal reserve notes should be understood. The issue of these notes has been carefully safeguarded by the Federal reserve act, and ample provision has been made for their redemption. Federal reserve notes are redeemable in gold; they can not be forced into circulation in payment of the expenses of the Government, or for any other purpose, as they can be issued only in exchange for gold or against a deposit of negotiable paper growing out of a legitimate commercial transaction, plus the required gold reserve of not less than 40 per cent. Upon payment of commercial paper which has been deposited to secure Federal reserve notes, there results either an immediate return of an equal amount of notes to the bank or an automatic increase in the percentage of gold reserve available for their redemption. Federal reserve notes are not legal tender, nor do they count as reserve money for member banks. They are issued only as a need for them develops, and as they become redundant in any locality they are returned to the Treasury at Washington or to a Federal reserve bank for redemption. Thus there can not at any time be more Federal reserve notes in circulation than the needs of the country at the present level of prices require, and as the need abates the volume of notes outstanding will be correspondingly reduced through redemption. The increased volume of Federal reserve notes in circulation during the past three years, in so far as it is not the result of direct exchanges for gold and gold certificates which have been withdrawn from circulation, is the effect of advancing wages and prices and not their cause.

There has undoubtedly taken place during the last two years a certain amount of credit expansion, which, under the circumstances connected with our war financing, was inevitable; but this will be corrected as the securities issued by the United States Government for war purposes are gradually absorbed by investors. This credit expansion is equal to the difference between the total of the war expenditures of the Government, on the one hand, and, on the other, the total amounts raised by the Government through taxation and by the sale of its obligations so far as paid for out of savings. No reliable estimate can be made of this difference, which must be gradually absorbed through future savings, for the reason that banks are lending, and will always lend, freely on Government bonds as collateral.

The principal cause of the advance of prices before and during the war was the urgent need of the Governments of the allied world for goods of all kinds for quick delivery in large volume, and the competition of this buying by governments with purchases by private individuals who failed to contract their expenditures at a rate commensurate with the growing expenditures of these governments. In the postwar period through which we are now passing the country has experienced rising prices, owing in part to a general relaxation of the war-time régime of personal economy, resulting in an increased demand for commodities by individuals who restricted their purchases during the war but who are now buying in competition with export demand. In addition, accrued incomes and increased wages have led to heavy demands for commodities not of prime necessity which have resulted in diverting labor and material from essentials to nonessentials.

The Federal Reserve Board believes that any currency legislation at this time is unnecessary and undesirable, and would suggest that, whether viewed from an economic or financial standpoint, the remedy for the present situation is the same, namely, to work and to save; to work regularly and efficiently, in order to produce and distribute the largest possible volume of commodities; and to exercise reasonable economies in order that money, goods, and services may be devoted primarily to the liquidation of debt and to the satisfaction of the demand for necessities, rather than to indulgence in extravagances or the gratification of a desire for luxuries. The war is over—in a military sense—and while the bills have been settled by loans to the Government, these obligations, so far as they are carried by the banks, must be absorbed before the war chapter of the financial history of the country can be closed.

Very truly, yours,

W. P. G. HARDING, Governor.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD a paper by Maj. Harry B. Hawes, of St. Louis, Mo., who has recently been connected with the Government service abroad, touching upon the league of nations. This article appeared in the St. Louis Republic, St. Louis Globe-Democrat, and St. Louis Post-Dispatch on July 27, 1919.

There being no objection, the paper was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS AND SUGGESTIONS.

[By Harry B. Hawes.]

"FREEDOM OF DISCUSSION.

"During the period of the war it was my privilege, in fact, for long periods of time it became a necessity for me to read the English papers and have read to me the French and Spanish papers. The freedom of discussion on all subjects which did not relate to the movement of troops or furnish military information to the enemy was remarkable. Even in Germany the papers during the critical periods of the war carried long articles by Maximilian Harden, and several of the big socialistic newspapers were critical to an extreme. There seemed to be a fuller, freer discussion permitted, or at least carried on, in Europe than in America.

"From the time of our entering the war until November, when it became apparent that Germany was defeated and an armistice was declared, our newspapers followed our President with unanimity and an absence of criticism, a fidelity and patriotism which were remarkable, especially so as it was in such marked contrast to the discussions which were carried on by our Allies in Europe. With the signing of the armistice in November and the realization that the physical war was over, criticism and a division of sentiment appeared, and the press of our Nation resumed to a certain extent its great privilege of individual thought and expression. And so it was with men. So long as any information could reach the enemy showing a divided counsel or opinion it was suppressed. Unfortunately treaties, parts of treaties, and the covenant of the league of nations were delayed for some reason in their transmission to the United States. European nations and newspapers had these in advance of the American people. Communications traveled fast in Europe by post and telegraph. Our communications came by cable—a single wire extended on the bottom of the ocean from Europe to America, 3,500 miles away, with censors at both ends—a wise provision while war continued, but fraught with danger where it attempted to control discussion of instruments of peace.

"Our long silence and proper restraint during the period of the war seem to have unconsciously extended over to the period of peace. Men have, to a great extent, refrained from an expression of opinion and discussion, probably because they have not yet awakened to the fact that the war is ended, but that we have entered upon a period in which the discussion rests solely upon one of great national foreign policy. Slowly this restraint is passing and two dividing groups are forming. One would have the minds of the American people directed toward the Government of America and keep ever foremost America and the United States; the other is giving preference to the consideration of the disputes and troubles of European nations and but secondary thought to our own affairs. How these opposing groups will ultimately find expression is problematical, and no absolute certainty can be reached until the two great parties have spoken or a third movement is under way providing for an expression of opinion which does not agree with the declarations of either of the old parties.

"Because of contiguity the European statesmen have made a closer study of the Governments of Europe and their racial characteristics. All speak at least three languages.

"Because of our isolation Americans generally have given but little attention to the subject of international law or to history relating to European affairs. We are acquainted with our quarrels with England, Spain, and other countries, but there is amongst the mass of our people much ignorance on these subjects, and they have too quickly formed opinions.

"THE LEAGUE.

"Let all our citizens attend discussions on the subject of the league of nations, hear both sides, and retain some mental reservations until the discussion is concluded. It is unfortunate that the proposed covenant of the league of nations should have been so interwoven with the peace treaty that it now becomes difficult to separate the two. Separate documents would have given an opportunity for better understanding.

"It is to be expected the United States Senate will ratify the peace treaty with Germany, and discussion is now directed to that part relating to the league of nations. The ultimate decision will be (1) a ratification, (2) rejection, (3) ratification with amendments, or (4) ratification with reservations.

"As the league was undoubtedly the result of many compromises, and as our President apparently granted the requests of England, France, Italy, and Japan in the treaty of peace, it would seem that any proper request emanating from the Senate either in the form of amendment or reservation would be accepted.

"If the commission which represented us at the Paris conference should prefer not to represent the United States in a request for amendment or reservation, a new commission should be appointed which will secure such amendments or reservations.

"It seems inconceivable that after our service to the Allies in blood, money, and cooperation any proper request would be refused. And if their temper is such that they will not make concession now, it would be well for Americans to know it, and we can sign such portion of the compact as relates to the treaty of peace and withdraw from the league of nations. We have granted all their demands for land, money, ships, and protection, and it is decidedly important for us to know immediately whether a request for a change in the machinery of the compact of the league will be refused.

"We gave our Allies all they asked for. Can not the American people be permitted a mere change of machinery in the league?

"Certain reservations and amendments are at least essential to secure united support for the league, and without such reservations it will become a dividing political issue for years to come.

"Our domestic affairs require immediate consideration, and a long, bitter, national controversy over foreign affairs will distract attention from these reconstruction problems.

"I believe we should demand such reservations or amendments as will (1) preserve the Monroe doctrine; (2) permit our withdrawal from the league upon resolution by our Congress; (3) eliminate all matters for discussion that relate to our domestic affairs, such as tariff, finance, immigration, and so forth; (4) that all questions relating to war shall first be submitted to Congress and approved by that body before war is declared; (5) remove all obligation upon us to oppose the right of peoples to change their form of government or to secure their independence as did the American Colonies from England.

"NO GOVERNMENT MACHINERY FOR POPULAR EXPRESSION.

"At the conclusion of hostilities our President appointed himself, selected four associates, and proceeded to the conference in Paris. These five men spoke for the United States of America, and from the first meeting until the treaty was signed theirs was the voice of the United States.

"Whether the commission truly interpreted or failed to interpret the wishes of the American people, they were placed in the unfortunate position of not knowing positively what our people wanted. They guessed that it favored a certain policy, which was their policy, and it may be they guessed correctly. To this day they do not know. If they had known there would be no discussion in the Senate.

"Our Constitution provides that treaties shall be made by the President 'by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.' So far as I have been able to ascertain, the advice of the Senate was never asked as to the terms of the treaty or the covenant of the league.

"With the exception of his failure to confer with the Senate before concluding his covenants, we can have no proper criticism of the President's course, for the reason that no other method was provided under which he could proceed; so that many of the difficulties and complaints we have to-day are due to a failure to provide for an expression of opinion by the people, or at least by their Representatives in Congress.

"Contrasting the lack of machinery in the United States Government for this expression of opinion, we turn to the other members of the big four—George of England, Clemenceau of France, and Orlando of Italy. When these men spoke for England, France, and Itally they knew that if at any time they failed to properly interpret the wishes of their countries, the legislative branches of their Governments had in their possession the power of recall.

"Few Americans have given consideration to the Governments of these three countries, but it is a fact that all European nations, whether monarchy or republic, have parliamentary forms of government. George, Clemenceau, and Orlando are premiers of cabinets. They originate and present to the parliaments of their respective countries certain governmental measures in the form of bills. Some of these premiers represent a party; others represent a coalition of parties; but it is the unwritten law, the established custom—and failure to observe such custom would bring revolution—for the premier frequently to ask for a vote of confidence from the elected representatives of the people. If this vote of confidence is withheld, he immediately resigns and a successor is appointed. Or, in the absence of a request for a vote of confidence, he may even present a measure in the form of a bill, and if this measure is of vital interest to the nation and is defeated, he immediately resigns. So we find that the government machinery of England, France, and Italy all provide for quick methods of recall of their representatives.

"When the matter of Fiume came before the Paris conference our President appealed to the people of Italy over the head of Orlando for a decision, and immediately we find Orlando taking the first train for Italy, appearing before the parliament, and asking for a vote of confidence. There was the machinery ready-made to tell Orlando whether he really did or did not speak for the Italian people. And it will be remembered that he refused to return to the conference in Paris until the legislative branch of his government had discussed and approved his position. Not only do the legislative branches of the Governments of England, France, and Italy retain the right of direction and approval over treaties, but this is true of nearly every government in Europe. We find the representatives of Greece, Spain, and other countries representing their nations with the same restrictions, the same power of recall, and the same right of the legislative branch of the government to participate.

"The European peoples on bloody battle fields forged their magna chartas or constitutions, and in nearly every constitution in Europe will be found an express denial of the right of the sovereign to make treaties or to declare war without the permission of the parliamentary branch of the government.

"Let us assume, for the purpose of illustration, that our President was not the man of high character, great intelligence, and broad statesmanship that he is, but had developed into a schemer bent upon self-glorification or some personal project which did not represent any portion of public sentiment in this country, and that he was proceeding upon a course which 95 per cent of Americans disapproved of or one which met with universal condemnation. There is no machinery of government which could have removed him from the conference.

"What would have been the result? The American people would have been helpless excepting for the check placed in our Constitution for securing the consent of the Senate. No king, monarch, president, or ruler of a single nation in Europe is permitted to exercise the same unrestricted right as our laws give to a President.

"The President must not be blamed because he exercised these unusual, extraordinary powers which had been taken away many years ago from the potentates of Europe. It is not his fault; it is the omission of our law.

"So one of the vital questions which the American people must decide is, Shall we ever again make a treaty through a President without some provision by which the parliamentary or legislative branch of our Government can not at all times voice opinion, give advice, and, in case this advice is ignored, have the power to withdraw from any treaty conference the representatives of the American people and authorize others who do represent the opinion of the people expressed through the legislative branch of the Government?

"Will the Democratic Party, the Republican Party, or a new party secure for the people of the United States a right that is possessed even by the people living under the monarchies of Europe, or shall our Executive retain and exercise a power more unrestricted, unrestrained, and autocratic than that of any European ruler?

"This is a problem for the future and is independent of the question of the ratification or approval of the peace treaty or the league of nations.

"HISTORIC LIGHT.

"Until 1914 my own knowledge of international law was not greater than that of the average American lawyer. But in 1914, in order to combat German propaganda against the loan of money and the export of arms to the Allies prior to our entrance into the war, I gave attention to the subject of international law, and during the last year, through my governmental connection, an intensive study of the machinery of foreign governments was forced upon me.

"It has been said that 'the future is but the past entered by a different door,' and if this be so, then the study of history is absolutely essential to an understanding of the proposed covenant of the league of nations. The average man considers it a new plan, something entirely novel, some kind of an intellectual inspiration which descended from heaven upon the big four in Paris and was given birth there. The most superficial study of history will show the utter fallacy of this belief. Leagues of nations of uncivilized, semicivilized, and civilized peoples throughout the ages have been formed, and in the course of time have disintegrated—all formed to prevent war and all ultimately provocative of war.

"The United States, in its little more than a hundred years of political life, has held aloof from such leagues, believing that her service to humanity lay in the formation of a distinct nation. The making of a nation, the development of a true, sane, national life, was the function of the people of this country. We said frankly to the governments of Europe that we did not propose to meddle in their affairs until some action of theirs jeopardized our own national life and, through the Monroe doctrine, that we would not permit European governments either to impose their forms of government upon the different peoples of the American Continent or meddle in their domestic affairs.

"In 1914 the German Kaiser, suffering from a form of insanity called egoism, undertook with fire and sword to subjugate Europe and bend the nations to his will. He nearly succeeded and probably would have succeeded had it not been for the interference of the United States in the last instance and the heroic defense of little Belgium in the first instance.

"The second decade of the nineteenth century marked the downfall of another egomaniac, this time a Frenchman, Napoleon Bonaparte, suffering from the same form of insanity as the Kaiser, trying to bend all the nations of Europe to his will with fire and sword and extend the control of France over Europe, as the Kaiser had attempted to extend the influence of Germany.

"After Napoleon's defeat, which was brought about by a coalition of England, Germany, Russia, and other nations, an advocate for a league of nations appeared in Europe at the congress of Vienna. We read this description:

"It was as if immediately on the ending of this bitter war, which had racked all Europe, he floated out into a very sea of glory. He had been important before; he now seemed almost omnipotent. His visit to Paris was a triumph, the entry such as no foreign representative had ever enjoyed. He spoke of it afterwards to one of his official family and there were tears in his eyes at the memory. 'The people wanted to embrace my knees, to kiss my hands and feet.' During his entire stay crowds waited constantly outside his residence; enviously they watched deputations of workers and learned men and delegates from the small oppressed nations go in at the doors, and when these reappeared they cheered them merely for that they had seen and praised the great man. His public utterances rang through Europe. How stirring was his proposal to establish in place of the 'unjust aggressor's tyrannical system those strong and liberal institutions which are adapted to this enlightened age.' How fine was his avowal that 'to be serviceable to mankind is the sole object of my conduct and the only motive which has brought me here.' 'Where is he stopping?' asked some one during his Paris visit, and the reply was, 'On Virtue Street, at the Magnanimity Hotel.' Praises, toasts, parades, gifts, te deums, a visit to the mint and a medal struck off, with the inscription, 'To the restorer of peace in Europe.' There was one in exile who had thought to ride emperor of the world through the streets of Paris. What must his feelings have been to learn of another usurping the triumph, supported by the plaudits of humanity!

"The enthusiasm was the same in England; speeches by the lord mayor, a gorgeous banquet at the Guildhall, honors, eulogies, and perpetually cheering crowds. Everywhere the simple modesty of this man touched the popular imagination. Oxford honored him with the doctor of laws. 'But how can I accept the diploma?' he demurred. 'I have passed no examination.' The reply won thunderous applause. 'You have brilliantly won a case against the oppressor of nations, a test which is more than any jurisconsult has ever achieved.' This in practical England, which but a little while since had met his professions with a cold ear! England had responded grudgingly to this eloquence about 'the cause of liberty and the interests of mankind.' She had read in these pledges of unselfishness something of Pharisaism, and the constant distinction between enemy government and enemy people rankled not a little. But with his actual presence the opposition withdrew; dissenting politicians could not but retire, and the voice of the people spoke.

"The facts are that these sensational phenomena were in evidence nearly a hundred years ago, after the downfall of Napoleon, who had the same ambitions as the German Kaiser. The man who received this prone adulation and carried with him a league of nations was none other than Czar Alexander, of Russia. The description of his receptions in the countries of Europe has a familiar ring, and yet he was a ruler of most despotic power and of a country that then hardly knew the meaning of the word 'liberty.'

"It would seem highly probable that in the loss by death of over 7,500,000 men and the wounding and maiming of some 20,000,000 more and the destruction of billions of property Europe is now so exhausted that there should not be another great war in a quarter of a century, no matter what kind of a league is proposed, accepted, or rejected. In this belief we can and should proceed slowly, with circumspection, to a study of history and facts before we irrevocably bind ourselves in a world-wide compact. A good maxim to bear in mind at this time is that 'where it is not necessary to do a thing, then it is necessary not to do it.'

"In his first inaugural President Lincoln said:

"My countrymen, one and all, think calmly upon this whole subject. Nothing valuable can be lost by taking time. If there be an object to hurry any of you in hot haste to a step which you would never take deliberately, that object will be frustrated by taking time, but no good object can be frustrated by it.

"RACIAL DIFFERENCES.

"The average American does not understand the European 'en masse.' Each nationality has its peculiar characteristics of thought, dress, manners, food, and life; the American is unaware in large part of these racial characteristics.

"The United States, when it enters into a field of government in Europe, proceeds upon unknown paths beset with many dangers, and while many of our people will quickly discuss governments by theory their practical experience and contact with the nations of Europe is so limited that they can not but make mistakes and cause misunderstandings.

"England is a nation of Englishmen, France of Frenchmen, Spain of Spaniards, Italy of Italians; there is probably only one nation—Switzerland—which has not clearly marked racial lines. Part of the population of Switzerland is of German origin, another portion is Italian, and a third French; so that today the complex blood ties of the Swiss citizens constantly cause trouble. During the whole period of the last war the Swiss Cantons of Zurich (which is largely of German origin) were distinctly pro-German. The French Cantons of Geneva and that section were distinctly proally in sentiment, as were the Italian Cantons of the south. This made of little Switzerland a place of turmoil and confusion, and it became the great spy center of all Europe.

"When we turn to our own country we find the most complicated problem of any. Suppose our commissioners have presented to them an adjustment between the Jugo-Slavs and the Italians. While this discussion proceeds, as much as we may dislike it, the natural sympathy of the millions of Italians in this country will be at once arrayed on the Italian side of the controversy. Or let us assume that it is a controversy which originates between Norway and Sweden. We have hundreds of thousands of these people in our population, and while that controversy continues they will divide in their sympathies along racial blood lines. Or if it is a discussion on the subject of Jerusalem—the sacred and ancient home of the Jew—it is but natural that the Jewish portion of our population would, at least in some measure, have a special interest in this discussion. The question might arise of England's desire to control Jerusalem, and the Jews in America might not want this. So American thought will be divided on each new problem presented before the commissioners of the league of nations. We observed with some alarm that blood lines had their effect before our war with Germany, and while upon the declaration of war by the United States the German-American did his full share, and did it well, yet prior to our entrance into the war they were permitted and had the legal right to express their preference, and they did so.

"Now comes the Irish question, thrust upon us by the doctrine of the self-determination of nations. No constitutional statesman of America believes that the United States has the right to dictate to England what her course should be regarding Ireland. For years many of us have given to the Irish cause our contributions and our sympathies, just as we contributed and gave our sympathies to the Boers in their war for freedom. But we did not ask, nor did the Irish-American ask, that the United States Government intercede or engage in any official way in a movement for Irish home rule. Yet, when we officially enunciate a doctrine that all of the races of the earth have the right of self-determination with regard to their government, and that the Jugo-Slav and the Armenian have the right to select the United States as one of its champions on the question of self-determination, what answer can be made—that is, what logical answer can be made—to the Irishman who makes the same demand?

"How far discussions, which will soon come, which can not be avoided, on boundaries, forms of government, etc., which will be brought before the league of nations will divide our people again into racial groups I do not know, but I look to the future with some apprehension.

"When a contention comes before the executive committee of the council of the league in which Italy is involved, Italian pressure from the United States will be brought to bear. When questions involving Ireland are considered, if they are permitted to be considered, Irish sentiment and Irish pressure will be brought to bear. And so it will be with the Norwegian and the Swede, the Greek, and the Armenian; and it will have a tendency to keep alive organizations and societies of these different nationalities which in my opinion should not exist if they are to be Americans first, last, and for all time.

"Then again, these questions will involve matters of religion. We find, for instance, the official religion in some of the countries is Catholic; in other countries it is Protestant; and when differences arise between the Protestant and the Catholic countries, what is to prevent the church sympathy of one side or the other asserting itself and creating trouble in our own country? Switzerland has this racial trouble to-day, and Switzerland is essentially democratic in government and liberal in its policies.

"KEEP THE RECORD STRAIGHT.

"During the last few months we have been told that we went to war with Germany to preserve democracy; to put democracy above autocracy; to establish the principle of the self-determination of nations; to free the little nations of Europe; and various other fine reasons. All these are splendid thoughts and theories. But let us keep the record clear.

"President Wilson, in April, 1917, declared to Congress:

"* * * Vessels of every kind, whatever their flag, their character, their cargo, their destination, their errand, have been ruthlessly sent to the bottom without warning and without thought of help or mercy for those on board, the vessels of friendly neutrals along with those of belligerents.

"Even hospital ships carrying relief of the sorely bereaved and stricken people of Belgium, though the latter were provided with safe-conduct through the prescribed areas by the German Government itself and were distinguished by unmistakable marks of identity, have been sunk with the same reckless lack of compassion or of principle. * * *

"The present German submarine warfare against commerce is a warfare against mankind. * * *

"That same night both Houses of Congress adopted the following resolution:

Whereas the recent acts of the Imperial German Government are acts of war against the Government and people of the United States:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the state of war between the United States and the Imperial German Government which has thus been thrust upon the United States is hereby formally declared.

"And the United States went to war.

"We might have added that we knew if Germany was successful in beating France, Russia, England, and Italy to their knees Europe would be dominated by Germany, and that a German monarchy dominating Europe would confront the people of the United States with a growing and terrible power which might ultimately reach out and try for supremacy on our continent.

"These were the causes which led the United States into war and not glittering generalities which only began to appear after the armistice was declared. Our people mobilized. They mobilized their men, their women, their children, their money, their food, and their every resource. We saw red, and, thank God, we did see red! We wanted to punish the Kaiser and his junkers. When our boys had stemmed the German tide at Chateau-Thierry and the Argonne and sent them reeling back, giving the French and English a chance to take breath, we thought they were headed for Berlin. No one considered an armistice which would last for eight months, and a league of nations and the doctrine of self-determination of races were not considered at that time. While the big four divided Europe, discussed the league of nations, and transferred German possessions in Europe, Asia, Africa, and China to our various allies, over 1,500,000 American soldiers marked time. So if you find our boys coming home complaining of captious spirit, and inclined to criticism, consider what their occupation has been for the last six or seven months. Fighting over, wisely enough their officers could not permit them to remain idle. Idleness breeds mischief; it provokes fights; it causes trouble. So our soldiers, in order to be kept occupied, were compelled to clean tents, polish cannon, rub up rifles, mend uniforms, dig trenches, and drill. Home far away, they went through the academic exercises of clean, drill, drill, clean; engaged in the occupations not of war but of the training camp for seven long months after the war was over. It hurt their spirits. It almost broke their hearts. At least 1,500,000 homes had a representative marking time, marking time, and again marking time when they were wanted back home, in the office, in the workshop, or on the farm. And it cost our Nation $100,000,000 a day while our boys marked time. Can you blame our boys for being disgruntled?

"In November, 1918, the United States of America stood at the very pinnacle of world esteem, and as each month passed by and each new contention appeared that prestige dropped until to-day we read from our psychological experts the statement that it has reached low ebb.

"Do sensible men believe that our draft would have worked smoothly, that our millions would have gone cheerfully to slaughter, simply to demonstrate the theories of the doctrinaire?

"The violation of international law, the brutal treatment of Belgium, and the thought that our turn might come made America see red; and, seeing red, she went to war, and went to war for punishment and not for the purpose of participating in the government of Europe after the war was over!

"When the work on the battle field had been done and a decision reached by force of arms, we could have said to Europe, 'We are through! You have seen what we can do; we can do it again; and, furthermore, we will do it again! We will stand for the right and we will unite with any nation which stands for the right in the future!' If we had pursued this policy, we would have had the affection and the admiration of all the nations of the earth; our independence would have been complete; our achievements would have been acknowledged.

"A SUGGESTION.

"The President should recommend that our laws be so changed that no commission to a peace conference, or to serve as our representative in the league of nations, should proceed upon its work without instruction or reserving to Congress—or one of the branches of Congress—the power of recall. Pending the amending of our laws, if the President is called upon to appoint such commission their names should be first submitted to the Senate for its approval or rejection.

"There are questions of a domestic nature which we will settle in our own fashion, as we have settled them in the past.

"There is no room for Bolshevism in our country, and while we demand idealism in our leaders we shall want men who, when they fix their eyes upon the stars, will have their feet squarely and firmly planted upon the ground.

"There were brave men before Agamemnon, and there are brave men to-day who will demand a settlement of America's problems on the basis of American nationality."

BUILDINGS ON ARLINGTON FARM.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. FERNALD. I yield.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I observed the other day while riding through Potomac Park that an unsightly barn was being erected between the Lincoln Memorial and the Arlington Mansion and the new amphitheater. I was very much surprised and inquired of the Commission on Fine Arts in reference to the matter. I learned that the Agricultural Department was erecting the barn; that there was a question as to the jurisdiction of the Agricultural Department over the particular land; and that possibly its jurisdiction was in the Department of War.

I desire to offer a resolution in order to check that vandalism, for it is the destruction of the beauty of nature. I ask that the resolution be read and ordered to lie on the table under the rules, to be taken up for consideration to-morrow.

The resolution (S. Res. 161) was read and ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the Secretary of Agriculture be requested to discontinue the construction of and to remove the unsightly buildings on the so-called Arlington Farm on the Potomac between the Lincoln Memorial and the Arlington Mansion and the new amphitheater.

LOSSES OF PUBLIC BUILDING CONTRACTORS.

Mr. FERNALD. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6323) for the relief of contractors and subcontractors for the post offices and other buildings and work under the supervision of the Treasury Department, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed, under such regulations as he may prescribe, to receive fully itemized and verified claims and reimburse contractors and their subcontractors, including material men, for the construction, improvement, special repair, equipment, or furnishing of post offices and other buildings or work under the supervision of the Treasury Department (as well as the United States courthouse in the District of Columbia and the approaches and retaining wall to the Lincoln Memorial in the District of Columbia) whose contracts were awarded or whose bids as thereafter accepted were mailed or delivered to the proper governmental authority prior to the entrance of the United States into the war with Germany, to wit, April 6, 1917, and whose contracts have been or will be completed after said date, for loss due directly to increased costs thereafter arising, due either, first, to increased cost of labor or materials, or, second, to delay on account of the action of the United States Priority Board or other governmental activities, or, third, to commandeering by the United States Government of plants or materials shown to the Secretary of the Treasury to have been sustained by them in the fulfillment of such contracts by reason of war conditions alone: Provided, That any subcontractor may submit his claim through the contractor or to the Secretary of the Treasury. And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to submit from time to time estimates for appropriations to carry out the provisions of this act: Provided further, That no claims for such reimbursement shall be paid unless filed with the Treasury Department within three months after the passage of this act: And provided further, That in no case shall the contractor or subcontractor be reimbursed to an extent greater than is sufficient to cover his actual increased cost in fulfilling his contract or subcontract, exclusive of any and all profits to such contractor or subcontractor; nor shall such reimbursement include any advances or payments made by the sureties of such contractor or subcontractor in executing the work, but the surety on any contract coming within the provisions of this act who, as surety, has completed, or may complete, the work of any defaulting contractor on any such contract, or who has furnished financial assistance to a failing contractor on any such contract whereby such contractor has been enabled to complete such contract, may file claim, within the period hereinbefore fixed, and be reimbursed in the manner hereinbefore provided for the increased cost due to the causes hereinbefore specified of the labor and material supplied in so completing any such contract, or for the increased cost of the labor and material paid for from funds so furnished by such surety: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall report to Congress at the beginning of each session thereof the amount of each expenditure and the facts on which the same is based.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. POMERENE. I suggest to the chairman of the committee that he ask to have inserted in the RECORD the report of the committee on the bill, as explaining the reasons for its passage.

Mr. FERNALD. I have no objection. I shall be very glad to have that done.

The report submitted by Mr. FERNALD on the 11th instant is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 146, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session.]

Mr. FERNALD, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred H. R. 6323, has considered the same and reports the same back with the recommendation that the bill do pass without amendment.

The purpose of the bill is to reimburse contractors and subcontractors for the construction of post offices and other buildings under the supervision of the Treasury Department.

For further report I would refer to the report of the Public Buildings and Grounds Committee of the House accompanying the bill.

The committee would add to this, however, the importance of prompt action, as a large number of the contractors are now in sore need of funds which would be available as soon as the bill passes and the matter can be brought to the attention of the Treasury Department for adjustment.

The bill has the approval of Hon. William G. McAdoo, former Secretary of the Treasury, as well as that of the present Secretary, Hon. Carter Glass. The letter of Secretary Glass follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, August 7, 1919.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS,
United States Senate.

SIR: Reference is made to your request of the 5th instant for a report in connection with bill H. R. 6323, recently passed by the House of Representatives, and which provides for the relief of contractors and subcontractors for the post offices and other buildings and work under the supervision of the Treasury Department.

This bill proposes to furnish relief to contractors and subcontractors engaged on public work who have suffered loss as the result of heavy increase in the cost of labor and materials during the war. It is a matter of common knowledge that the cost of all labor and materials entering into the construction, furnishing, and equipment of public buildings was greatly increased as a result of war conditions, and this department believes that the proposed legislation is justified and that it will be possible to give proper consideration to claims filed for relief under the provisions of the bill.

In response to your request for the number of contracts which would be affected by this bill and an estimate of the amount of money involved, you are advised that except as to major contracts it is practically impossible at this time to give either the number of claims which will probably be filed or the amount which will be involved. There is inclosed herewith a copy of a letter which was addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the last Congress, on January 4, 1919. As will be seen from an examination of this letter, the information contained therein was based upon a letter addressed to contractors engaged on public-building work during the war period and indicates the losses claimed by those communicated with. The claims made have, of course, so far received no examination and the total amount is liable to material change based upon the careful adjudication which will have to be made in case the proposed legislation is enacted.

While, therefore, the amount given in the letter referred to is $2,113,595.65, it is probable that the careful examination which will be made of all claims submitted will result in bringing the total amount well within the figures given.

Respectfully,

CARTER GLASS, Secretary.

The committee gave a public hearing on the bill and several contractors appeared. The evidence given was all practically along the same lines as shown in the printed copy of the hearings.

[House report No. 53, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred H. R. 6323, having considered the same, reports the same back with the recommendation that the bill do pass without amendment.

The purpose of the bill is to reimburse contractors and their subcontractors, including material men, for the construction of post offices and other buildings under the supervision of the Treasury Department, and the courthouse in the District of Columbia and the Lincoln Memorial, for increased cost due (1) to increased cost of labor or materials; (2) to delay on account of the action of the United States Priority Board or other governmental activities; and (3) to commandeering by the United States Government of plants or material shown to have been caused by war conditions alone.

All the buildings covered in the bill are under the supervision of the Treasury Department except the courthouse in the District of Columbia and the Lincoln Memorial. The courthouse in the District of Columbia, except that it is not under the supervision of the Treasury Department, is in all other respects substantially the same as the buildings covered by the bill that are under the supervision of the Treasury Department. The Lincoln Memorial, of course, is in a class by itself, but no citizen wishes a dollar unjustly taken from anyone to be used in the construction of a memorial to Abraham Lincoln.

Several of the contractors to be relieved by the terms of this bill, by the fault of the Government and without fault on their part, are on the verge of bankruptcy, and helping these contractors promptly will be helping them doubly. Prompt relief given to the contractors will also be of advantage to the Government, for when a contractor fails it causes delay and additional cost to the Government.

A similar bill for the relief of these contractors was unanimously reported by this committee in the third session of the Sixty-fifth Congress. The report accompanying that bill was written by the Hon. John L. Burnett, for many years a distinguished Member of the House of Representatives and of this committee. That report is so able, so just, and so clear that a large portion of it is quoted, adopted by the committee, and made a part of this report.

"It will be noted that the bill only proposes to indemnify contractors whose contracts were awarded or bids submitted before the declaration of war and whose contracts have been or will be completed after that date.

"It will be further noted that the bill specifically forbids any indemnity for profits.

"On December 2, 1918, the Secretary of the Treasury wrote the chairman of the committee as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, December 2, 1918.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS,
House of Representatives.

SIR: The department is in receipt of your letter of the 15th ultimo, inclosing copies of hearings held before your committee on "A proposal for the relief of contractors engaged on public building construction under the supervision of the Treasury Department," and notes the statement that your committee would like to have an expression of the department's views thereon.

It is a matter of common knowledge that the cost of all labor and materials entering into the construction, furnishing, and equipment of public buildings has greatly increased because of the war conditions, and the department deems that legislation along lines that have been suggested is justified. The department, however, is not in possession of data to enable it to submit an estimate as to the amount of money which would be required to adjust claims which may be filed in case the proposed legislation should be enacted.

If it is the purpose of Congress to enact legislation of this character, the department believes that its benefits should also be extended to contractors for furniture and equipment for public buildings. It would appear also that contractors who have finished their contracts should receive the same relief as those whose contracts are yet unfinished.

At the proper time the department would be gratified if an opportunity could be afforded it to submit its views upon the details of such bill as it may be the purpose of your committee to report.

Respectfully,

W. G. MCADOO, Secretary.

"These contractors had the right to base their bids, and did base their bids, on prices of labor and material existing at the time the contracts and the bids were made. After that conditions changed, and damages and loss were brought about by the action of the Government itself, one of the contracting parties. If it had been a contract between private parties and one of the parties brought about a condition entailing loss to the other party, in law and in good conscience the party responsible for the condition should have made good that loss. That is all this bill seeks to do.

"A precedent in point will be found in the river and harbor bill approved July 18, 1918. Other precedents not near so equitable as this bill presents are found in the act of Congress reimbursing contractors for damages done to the main Government buildings at the Panama Exposition by the storm of September 12, 1900 (32 Stats., 1275); also the contractors for the erection of the Baltimore customhouse caused by fire in February, 1904 (33 Stats., 453); also the contractor for the erection of the San Francisco customhouse for loss occasioned by the earthquake and fire in April, 1906.

"Many other cases equally as strong could be cited. In fact, these cases were of loss by act of God, while the cases involved in this bill are losses occasioned by one of the contracting parties itself.

"Were the United States a private party, and as such had done those things which have operated to increase the construction costs of the public buildings herein referred to, the courts undoubtedly would have held it liable to reimburse the contractors therefor. Its sovereignty alone protects it from legal responsibility in the courts, but the moral responsibility still exists.

"Then is it an honest Government which will not do without a suit what its own laws would compel one of its citizens to do by suit?

"Again, will a great, rich Government refuse to do that justice to its contractors that many States, cities, and individuals are doing to theirs? The State of New York has granted relief of this character to contractors for public works; so has the city of Philadelphia, and so have private individuals.

"In many instances the Government activities have so increased the price of labor as to actually take away the laborers from contractors. In some others the action of the priority board has prevented the delivery of material contracted for by the contractors. In others the Government has actually commandeered the plants that had agreed to furnish the material. In others the railroads became so congested with the transportation of war materials that they could not transport the materials. None of these things and others of like character were contemplated at the time of the making of the contracts or the bid. I will cite one or two instances. The following letter is a typical case:

PORTLAND, ME., January 6, 1918.

Representative JOHN L. BURNETT,
Chairman of Subcommittee, House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We wish to take this opportunity to place before you some of our reasons why, in our opinion, the United States Government should reimburse us for the losses we have sustained in the execution of our contract, namely, construction of quarantine station at House Island, Portland, Me., in order that we may be brought closer together in this matter which you have under your supervision for mutual settlement.

The labor question has been by far the most difficult and expensive item that we have had to contend with.

Due to the establishment of shipbuilding and fitting-out plants for the Emergency Fleet Corporation, we have had to meet nearly all of the demands for the laborers and mechanics whom we tried to retain in our employ under the eight-hour working schedule of the United States Treasury Department while the Fleet Corporation was offering these same men enormous weekly pay and overtime.

We have lost our entire crew at different times and had to resort to the employment of unskilled laborers and mechanics at very large salary, even going to the extreme of hiring fishermen from near-by islands to perform labor and mechanical work at which they were far inferior to any ordinary tradesman.

This necessitated additional supervision on our part, forcing us to reject all opportunity to take on any work outside of our House Island contract, because neither member of our firm could be spared away from the construction proper.

On a percentage job at the next island to our building, where the War Department was putting in a water main, some of our men were hired away from us to go to work for them, and they received pay from the time they sailed from Portland until they returned to Portland at the rate of 60 cents per hour for common labor, and on Saturday, when they only worked four hours, they received seven and one-half hours' pay.

After losing some of our best men by one man enticing his fellow workmen away, we were forced to again meet the conditions made by the war representatives of the United States Government and raise the pay of the men that we had left.

Special materials as called for by the Government can only be procured in a limited number of places. One illustration is a matter of placing an order for folding suspension bunks to be installed in the above-mentioned contract by us.

We had a proposal on the same at the beginning of our contract from a firm that was satisfactory to the Government. At the outbreak of our war with Germany the demands of the Government on this firm for furnishing similar folding beds in order that ships could be fitted out for the transportation of our boys overseas were so great that they canceled our acceptance of their proposal. We have tried all the other known firms, such as Bernstein Manufacturing Co., Gosso Manufacturing Co., etc., and have been unable to find anyone who can make a satisfactory bed as called for. That forced us to buy in the open market the upright columns and have cast the special flanges that go with them locally, as they were a part of the construction proper that held up the concrete roof, as this concrete work was holding back all the rest of the construction work, and we left the bunks for future consideration. These columns and flanges were very expensive, and we think that when we have completed the furnishing of the balance of the stock and labor and erect them in place we will have a loss of approximately $5,000.

To prove to you conclusively that we have sustained tremendous losses on our House Island contract, we wish to state that we have borrowed all the money the banks will loan us; we have used all of the money that our firm had; we are now indebted to everybody who will give us credit, and but for the assistance of a very close friend, who is backing us in money for our pay rolls, we would have to go into bankruptcy.

We are only hoping your committee will at once give us immediate assistance and save us the humiliation that is daily staring us in the face.

Very truly, yours,

MAHONEY CONSTRUCTION CO.,
By JOHN E. CONLEY, Treasurer.

"Many other cases of like character could be cited. Can we be fair with ourselves and ignore these claims?

"Many thousands of people have suffered financial losses as an incident of the war, but the cases covered by the bill are those where a contractual relation between the Government and the contractors, with all its obligations and equities, existed and the loss was occasioned by the acts of one of the contracting parties.

"The House has just passed a bill appropriating $100,000,000 for feeding the needy people of Europe.

"This was a charity pure and simple. Then, how can we hesitate to authorize this mere pittance to save a few of our own citizens from absolute bankruptcy because of the activities of our own Government?

While we are shedding tears over the people of foreign lands let us at least be just to our own."

HIGH COST OF LIVING.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I think it was about seven years ago, soon after I came to the House of Representatives, that I was asked by a lawyer friend of mine of Memphis, Tenn., Mr. Jere Horne, a very able lawyer and gentleman, to investigate the subject of cold storage and its effect upon health and upon prices. I made that investigation, and shortly afterwards introduced a bill on the subject in the other House. That bill was not my own composition, but followed a recommendation by the Committee on Manufactures of the Senate, which was made in 1910, and of which committee the late Senator Heyburn, of Idaho, was chairman. The only member of the committee who is now a Member of the Senate is the Hon. ELLISON D. SMITH, of South Carolina. One of my predecessors here from Tennessee, the Hon. James B. Frazier, was also a member of the committee. That committee had as its members not only the late Senator Heyburn, but also the late Senator from New Hampshire, Mr. Gallinger; former Senator Oliver, of Pennsylvania; and other distinguished Members of the Senate at that time.

The committee held very extensive hearings. I say "extensive," for many citizens were heard, many representatives of independent cold-storage concerns were heard, and the packers were heard in a way. Senator Heyburn invited them to appear before his committee, but they did not appear. He went to Chicago and undertook to secure their testimony, but they did not appear there. At that time the packers contented themselves with merely writing letters giving their side of the controversy, claiming that the proposed legislation was not necessary, and that they were practically conforming to what the committee had recommended.

In order to show the cavalier manner in which Senator Heyburn and his committee were treated, I quote the following from pages 215–216 of the hearings:

The CHAIRMAN. Now, before starting this morning, I want to put into the record a copy of a letter which I addressed, as chairman of the committee, to Mr. Arthur Meeker, who is one of Armour & Co., at Chicago, requesting them to be present and give the committee the benefit of such information as they had. The letter is as follows:

MAY 20, 1910.

Mr. ARTHUR MEEKER,
Care of Armour & Co., Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: Senate bill 7649, introduced as a result of the inquiry that is being made by a special committee appointed by the Senate to investigate the high cost of living, has been the subject of hearings before this committee. A number of representatives of those who conduct cold-storage plants, as well as chemists, have appeared before this committee and furnished information with reference to the alleged unwholesomeness of food kept in cold storage. By reason of your familiarity with the cold-storage business you could probably furnish valuable data which would be of interest and value to the committee in determining what action should be taken on the measure. Will you kindly indicate if you are willing to appear before the committee, when a date will be set for the hearing.

Yours, very truly,

——— ———.

I have his reply, under date of May 24, which is as follows:

MAY 24, 1910.

Hon. W. B. HEYBURN,
Chairman Committee on Manufactures, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I beg to acknowledge receipt of your courteous invitation to appear before the special committee appointed to investigate the high cost of living. I would gladly appear if I thought I could furnish any information that would be of value to the committee, but I have no special knowledge on the subject.

Thanking you, I am,

Yours, very truly, ARTHUR MEEKER.

I wish also to submit a copy of a letter which I wrote to Mr. T. J. Connor, general superintendent of Armour & Co., Chicago, requesting that they be present or have some representative appear to give us any information which they have. The letter is as follows:

MAY 20, 1910.

Mr. T. J. CONNOR,
General Superintendent Armour & Co., Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: For several weeks this committee has been considering Senate bill 7649, to prevent the sale or transportation in interstate commerce of articles of food held in cold storage for more than one year and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes, which was introduced as a result of the inquiry before the special Senate committee investigating the high cost of living. Quite a number of representatives of those engaged in cold-storage business as well as chemists have testified before the committee with reference to the alleged unhealthfulness of food kept in cold storage.

Thinking that because of your familiarity with the cold-storage business you would be able to furnish the committee valuable information on the subject, I write to inquire if you are willing to appear before the committee in the near future and give the result of your observations with reference to this subject and answer such inquiries as may be propounded by the committee?

Very truly, yours,

——— ———.

And I have his reply, which is as follows:

MAY 23, 1910.

Senator W. B. HEYBURN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 20th addressed to Mr. T. J. Connor received. Mr. Connor is out of the city at present, and expected to be absent for some time, so that it will probably not be possible for him to comply with your request.

Yours, respectfully,

A. E. GIFFEN,
Private Secretary.

Based on those hearings, however, an elaborate and a very carefully drawn bill was submitted by the committee; but it was not submitted until the day before the close of that session of Congress, and therefore was not acted upon and has not been acted upon since.

That bill, with amendments in several particulars, as it seemed to me it should be amended, has been introduced by me in every subsequent Congress. I have introduced as a matter of fact two such bills, one a general bill having for its basis the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution and the other a bill taxing cold-storage products after they have been in cold storage a fixed time. In my judgment, in either way the matter can be handled, but, of course, the best way is under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, and this is the bill which I wish to present for your consideration to-day.

By the way, while speaking of the power of Congress to deal with the subject, on yesterday I appeared before the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives, where the question of the constitutionality of the measure was raised by certain members of the Agricultural Committee of the House. It had been contended before that committee, as I understand, that any measure of this character was not constitutional. That matter, however, has been passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States, notably in a case to which I now desire to refer. I think we need not go further upon the constitutional question involved than to one opinion of the court. I refer to the case of McDermott against the State of Wisconsin and Brady against the State of Wisconsin, reported in Two hundred and twenty-eight United States on page 115 and following pages. In that case it is clearly laid down that a bill of this character, regulating cold storage and fixing a limit after which food may be regarded as adulterated and refused admission into interstate commerce, is constitutional. The cases cited arose under the pure food and drugs act, and I am going to read just enough to show to the lawyers of this body and to other legislators who are not lawyers that there can be no question as to the constitutionality of the proposed act. I quote from the opinion of the court, delivered by Mr. Justice Day:

That Congress has ample power in this connection is no longer open to question. That body has the right not only to pass laws which shall regulate legitimate commerce among the States and with foreign nations, but has full power to keep the channels of such commerce free from the transportation of illicit or harmful articles, to make such as are injurious to the public health outlaws of such commerce, and to bar them from the facilities and privileges thereof. Congress may itself determine the means appropriate to this purpose, and, so long as they do no violence to other provisions of the Constitution, it is itself the judge of the means to be employed in exercising the powers conferred upon it in this respect.

That is from page 128. I will merely read one further excerpt from page 130:

That the word "package," or its equivalent expression, as used by Congress in sections 7 and 8 in defining what shall constitute adulteration and what shall constitute misbranding within the meaning of the act, clearly refers to the immediate container of the article which is intended for consumption by the public, there can be no question. And it is sufficient for the decision of these cases that we consider the extent of the word "package" as thus used only, and we therefore have no occasion and do not attempt to decide what Congress included in the terms "original unbroken package" as used in the second and tenth sections and "unbroken package" in the third section. Within the limitations of its right to regulate interstate commerce Congress manifestly is aiming at the contents of the package as it shall reach the consumer, for whose protection the act was primarily passed, and it is the branding upon the package which contains the article intended for consumption itself which is the subject matter of regulation. Limiting the requirements of the act as to adulteration and misbranding simply to the outside wrapping or box containing the packages intended to be purchased by the consumer, so that the importer, by removing and destroying such covering, could prevent the operation of the law on the imported article yet unsold would render the act nugatory—and its provisions wholly inadequate to accomplish the purposes for which it was passed.

That is, a State act—

I read, in that connection, from section 1 of the bill:

That all shipments from any point in one State or Territory to any point in another State or Territory, within the United States, of adulterated or misbranded food products, as defined in this act and in the regulations made under the authority of this act, are hereby declared unlawful and are prohibited.

Then the second section proceeds as follows:

That any of the hereinafter-named articles of food which have been held in cold storage for more than the periods hereinafter designated, to wit:

Beef, or the manufactures or products thereof, seven months.
Veal, or the manufactures or products thereof, two months.
Pork, or the manufactures or products thereof, four months.
Sheep or goats, or the manufactures or products thereof, four months.
Lamb or kids, or the manufactures or products thereof, three months.
Poultry and game, or the manufactures or products thereof, three months.
Fish, or the manufactures or products thereof, two months.
Eggs, or the manufactures or products thereof, three months: Provided, however, That eggs held in cold storage not less than three months or more than seven months may not be classed as adulterated if they are upon inspection at the end of the three-month period sound and wholesome and are stamped or labeled as follows: "Second period cold-storage eggs," such stamp or label to be on each container from which said eggs are sold, and shall be in plain view of the purchaser, or, on demand, produced for inspection by the purchaser.
Butter, or the manufactures or products thereof, three months.

I shall not read more; but it is clear that under the established opinions of the Supreme Court it is constitutional for us to deal with this subject. It comes directly within the commerce clause of the Constitution, as interpreted in similar cases by our Supreme Court; and I am not going further into that subject. I hope my friends in the House who raised this question in the House committee yesterday will examine this case and the cases cited in it. If they do, they will not have any further trouble about the constitutional question.

Mr. President, I do not wish to have it understood from anything I may say that I am in the slightest degree opposed to that great benefaction to humankind known as cold storage. It is one of the greatest discoveries of the modern age. It gives to mankind vast advantages over what they had in the way of the use of foodstuffs before the discovery, and it may be interesting to know that the man who discovered it—a Frenchman by the name of Fellier—died in poverty just a short time ago. He made a discovery that is worth untold millions, and which has brought an inestimable boon to humanity, and yet he never reaped the benefits of his own wonderful discovery, and died in poverty and without any fame at all in connection with it, except that he had actually discovered it. He fitted out the first cold-storage ship that ever crossed the ocean.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I notice from reading the bill of the Senator that it looks toward governmental control of cold storage, and setting a limitation upon the time for which certain articles may be kept. Has the Senator investigated this phase of the matter, which has been brought to my attention?

Take eggs, for instance. During the spring and summer there is quite a plethora of eggs. Heretofore, during the winter, without cold storage, eggs were almost unobtainable. It has been brought to my attention that when the investigation of the cold-storage question was made an unusual number of eggs were found, because during this period of plethora they were storing them up; but at no time, so it was alleged, did they have more than two or three months' supply; that they would find the high-water mark in cold storage during the period of production in the spring and summer, and then when the fall and winter came on there would be a distribution of the same product which theretofore had gone to waste and spoiled, and that instead of being hoarding, according to their statement, it was nothing but preserving the overplus of the market to distribute during the time when there was practically no production. I wanted to know if the Senator had investigated that feature of this complaint against the hoarding of foodstuffs in cold storage.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think that before I get through I shall be able to demonstrate to the Senator that I have investigated that matter and investigated it very thoroughly. I want to come to the egg question specifically a few minutes later, and I shall be glad to answer the Senator's question then.

I might say in passing that one statement made by the Senator is in error according to the statistics. It is one of the most peculiar things in the world. The theory of distribution which the Senator suggested is the real theory that ought to exist in practice, but it does not because of the misuse of cold storage made by packers and other warehousemen. It is a curious thing that in 1913, when prices were what we would now term exceedingly low, in the period of scarcity of eggs, which is in the months of November, December, and January, eggs were higher under cold storage than they were at any period between the years 1870 and 1900 when they had statistics about them, when there was no cold storage. It is a remarkable thing, but I shall go into that question a little later.

Mr. President, recently the Federal Trade Commission has made a report as to certain articles kept in cold storage. That report is valuable as far as it goes. It does not include all of the products kept in cold storage, for the reason that, generally speaking, the majority of all cold-storage products are now kept in cold storage and have been kept in cold storage by the five great packers of the country. The reports that they have from the five great packers are inadequate. These reports are evidently taken largely from what are known as the independent warehouses. In this connection I might say right now that there are about 450,000,000 cubic feet of storage space in this country. About half of it, or perhaps a little more than half, is controlled by the packers and the other half by independent warehouses. To what extent the packers have secured a controlling interest in the independent warehouses has not yet been disclosed, but it should be disclosed and will be disclosed if we get the information that is provided for by this bill, by reason of the rules and regulations in regard to inspection that will come from it.

I now want to speak of just a few articles that were mentioned in the report of the Federal Trade Commission. The first of these is eggs.

On June 1, 1918, there were reported—and they merely give reports; as I understand, they have not the authority to exact reports, but they get reports through the Department of Agriculture—there were in storage on June 1, 1918, 5,440,000 cases of eggs, and on June 1, 1919, 5,975,000 cases, about 10 per cent more than in June, 1919, than there were in June, 1918; and yet the price of eggs is higher than it was a year ago. Frozen eggs were substantially in the same situation. There is a difference between frozen eggs and cold-storage eggs, which I will point out a little later.

I next come to the question of creamery-butter stocks. There was nearly twice as much creamery butter in storage in 1919 as there was in 1918, and yet the price has advanced higher than it was in 1918.

In the case of poultry, here is the most astonishing thing. I want to call the Senate's particular attention to the question of poultry. Taking poultry of all kinds, these figures show that there was three times as much poultry in stock on June 1, 1919, as there was on June 1, 1918, and still all kinds of poultry were 4 to 5 cents higher in price.

Mr. REED. What are the figures?

Mr. McKELLAR. As I said before, I am giving the figures reported here. We have not all the figures. I will give the Senator the report. Poultry of all kinds amounted to 54,570,000 pounds on June 1, 1919; on June 1, 1918, 18,340,000 pounds—a difference of practically three times, with a small decimal—three times as much poultry, taken as a whole, on June 1, 1919, as there was in 1918. Now, of course, all other questions aside, that shows beyond the peradventure of a doubt that the law of supply and demand is absolutely nugatory, so far as poultry is concerned.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator speaks of so much poultry being in stock. Does he use the words "in stock" and "in cold storage" interchangeably?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; this is in cold storage.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator used the words "in stock," and I wondered whether he meant "in cold storage."

Mr. McKELLAR. Three times as much in cold-storage stock. The law of supply and demand can not possibly be effective with that immense stock. The price goes up instead of down.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I desire to ask the Senator if he considers 54,000,000 pounds of poultry of all kinds an excessive amount to be in cold storage? That is a little less than one-half of 1 pound for every individual in the United States.

Mr. McKELLAR. As the Senator understands, these stocks are constantly being kept up and enlarged, and they are fit for comparison because of the fact that at this time last year, instead of being a half a pound, there was less than one-fifth of a pound of surplus stock for each individual in the country. In other words, this is the season of the year when stocks are being increased in cold storage, and, of course, we must look at them relatively. Then, in addition to that, this is not all the cold-storage stock. This only represents surplus in some of the warehouses.

Mr. REED. That is not just my question. I do not want to argue it with the Senator, but I want to get his view. I suppose the Senator will agree that there ought to be something in cold storage?

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course.

Mr. REED. While 54,000,000 pounds seems like a large amount, still this is a large country, and I want to know whether that would supply the United States more than two days if it were drawn on.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator wholly misunderstands the effect, it seems to me, of the figures. For instance, they are constantly adding to the stocks. It is 54,000,000 to-day, it may be that to-morrow it will be 55,000,000, it may be that the next day it will be fifty-four million and a half, and so on. There are certain stocks kept in storage. They are constantly adding to them or constantly subtracting from them. This does not constitute all the stock.

Mr. REED. They are constantly adding to them and taking away.

Mr. McKELLAR. And taking away.

Mr. REED. It is a reservoir.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is a reservoir. That reservoir was 18,000,000 pounds last year, and poultry commanded a certain price. This year the reservoir contains three times as much poultry, and still the price goes up about 4 cents a pound. It shows the law of supply and demand is no longer in force as to this commodity. By reason of being able to keep this stock in cold storage the owners can put it on the market or keep it off at will.

Mr. REED. I do not desire to take the Senator's time nor to take any sides in this matter, but I am simply in search for light. Does the mere fact that a year ago there were only 18,000,000 pounds on hand and that there are now 54,000,000 pounds on hand argue anything? Does it prove anything?

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator feels that way about it, of course, that is a matter for the Senator to consider. So far as I am concerned, I think it is most significant that when you have an immense surplus stock on hand the price should go up, and when you have a small surplus it also goes up. If I understand the law of supply and demand, it is that when the supply is greater the prices go down, and when the supply is less the prices rise. That is my understanding of it.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator let me interrupt him again?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad to be interrupted. I think I know something about this matter, and I will be glad to tell anything I can.

Mr. REED. I am seeking for information. The Senator says that in the year 1918 there were only about 18,000,000 pounds on hand in the month of June. Was not that a very much smaller stock than had been ordinarily carried?

Mr. McKELLAR. Just one moment, and I will give the Senator the information he asks.

Mr. REED. I do not know. I am just asking for light.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have a book here that I can give to the Senator which tells all about it.

Mr. REED. I could never find it in that book.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will undertake to find it for the Senator, then. I regret that I can not go on with some continuity in thought in reference to what I want to say.

Mr. REED. Then I withdraw my question.

Mr. McKELLAR. Wait one moment; I have it right here, and I will give it to the Senator. The Food Survey, gotten out by the Department of Agriculture, gives all these stocks, and I thought I had a Food Survey of three years ago, with which I would compare the stocks. So that the Senator's question may be answered, I will get the figures and put in the RECORD the exact amount of stock on hand in preceding years at the same time, running through a number of years. I have taken just two. The reason why I thought two were sufficient is that in 1918 we were in the midst of a great war, prices were soaring skyward, and at that time we had only 18,000,000 pounds surplus in storage in some of the warehouses. This year, with the war past, we have 54,000,000 pounds in storage in the particular warehouses that report, which are only a part of those that actually exist, and the price, instead of going down from the war-period price, is being lifted up; and I think there is some reason for its being lifted up, in view of the supply. I think it is monopoly raising the price. I think the law of supply and demand has been rendered inoperative.

Mr. REED. Now, will the Senator pardon me again?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. Is it or is it not a fact that about a year ago the Food Administration issued orders that no chickens should be marketed except roosters?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know. I do not know what effect that would have on the price. I do not believe it would have any. However, I do not know.

Mr. REED. That was the fact.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not believe that would have any effect, except on roosters.

Mr. REED. It might have had an effect on the amount in cold storage, might it not?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know. I think that is a very difficult proposition. I do not see the pertinency of it to this subject.

Mr. REED. I will state the pertinency of it. I am not trying to be witty, or anything of that sort.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am afraid the Senator is unwittingly witty.

Mr. REED. It may be that it is a funny thing; but I did not think it was funny when Mr. Hoover issued his order. I am not stating that the order was issued at that time. My recollection simply runs to the effect that it was about a year ago that we had the order issued that I refer to. If such an order was issued, it would have a natural tendency to keep poultry out of the market, and there would be a natural tendency, therefore, to draw upon the supplies and to lessen the supplies that were on hand. That is the point. I did not ask the question for the purpose of being humorous.

Mr. McKELLAR. If that is the point of it, either of two certain things must be true, either that the order was not carried out or that it was not made, for we find, as a matter of fact, that the stock of poultry on hand has increased 200 per cent.

Mr. REED. We understand that the hens have since been led to the slaughter, and roosters are not exclusively reserved.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not believe any reports give the statistics as between hens and roosters. They do give the statistics between hens and roosters on one side and broilers on the other, and I am going to call the attention of the Senate to that question in just a moment.

Mr. REED. I am not interested in broilers.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the Senator will be a little interested in broilers. I have some figures about them that are very interesting. I want to call attention to them in just one moment. Just let me finish this matter and I will be glad to answer any questions.

There is frozen poultry. The comparative figures, as taken from the Food Survey of the Department of Agriculture, June 27, 1919, show the total pounds as 4,571,513 in 1919, as against 18,339,127 in 1918. The broilers referred to are the small chickens that are served in any good hotel, and my recollection is that you pay for them at the first-class hotels about $1.50 each, or something like that. Here is the situation as to broilers: In 1918 there were 1,709,557 pounds. In 1919 there were 8,660,284 pounds, 506 per cent more of this particular class of fowl on hand in 1919 than there were in 1918, a war being on in 1918, peace in 1919, and the price of broilers rising still higher.

The same is true as to roasters. The figures are here. Of roasters there were 3,923,303 pounds in 1918 and 14,030,763 pounds in 1919, a difference of 357 per cent. And yet the price of roasters and broilers and all other kinds of poultry, in spite of the enormous stocks that we have on hand now, are from 4 to 5 cents higher at wholesale than they were then. What is the necessary conclusion? It is but one, and that is that the packers of the country, the cold-storage people who are interested in these things, are able to keep these products off the market. They put them on the market at will. The law of supply and demand no longer affects that combination of capital, and it is controlling the country's food without regard to the law of supply and demand. That is what it is.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator is giving certain statistics and figures as to the number of pounds of fowl in cold storage. Was that on a particular date?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; on a particular date.

Mr. WATSON. At what particular time of the year are the most of the fowls placed in cold storage?

Mr. McKELLAR. Fowls are different from eggs. Of course broilers are put in in the early spring, but even then that has its limitation. If the Senator will wait just a moment, I will get to that subject. I will discuss the question of eggs and then of chickens, which will answer absolutely the Senator's question, as it seems to me.

Mr. WATSON. I wish merely to make this further observation. The Senator has provided a certain length of time that fowls shall stay in cold storage and that eggs shall stay in cold storage, with the privilege of renewal for eggs, as I understand it?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is correct.

Mr. WATSON. With no privilege of renewal for fowls?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will give the reason in a few moments.

Mr. WATSON. If most of the fowls were placed in cold storage along in the spring and summer and you provide that they shall remain there not more than three or four months, what do you expect to do about the distribution of meat of that character throughout the winter months? It will all be distributed before that, will it not?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will answer that question right now. I would rather do it in a different way, but I will answer the Senator's question right now. The experiments of the Department of Agriculture, by a very noted scientist, show that after a period of three months fowls kept in cold storage are not good for human consumption, and we must find some plan by which they may be kept good. We must, therefore, fix the time when they are allowed to be kept in cold storage at three months.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I am very much interested in what the Senator is saying, and I have not heard all that he has said up to date, so I am going to ask two questions in order that I may start right. About what per cent of cold-storage products are included in the statistics given by the Senator, and what may we understand to be the total amount of cold-storage products?

Mr. McKELLAR. The figures are not accurate. Ten years ago, when they had no accurate reports on the packers, it was supposed that about 10 per cent of all the foodstuffs of the country subject to cold storage was kept in cold storage. Of course, the greater supply of foodstuffs, even now, as popular and as common as cold storage has become, and the greater body of meats of all kinds, are not kept in cold storage. Then, again, it depends upon what the character of the cold storage is. These figures usually apply to frozen cold storage. There is another kind of cold storage known as cooler cold storage. Cold-storage people make a distinction between the two kinds.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Let me state what I am asking particularly about. The Senator attempts to give us the weight of chickens in cold storage. What do those statistics include as to chickens in proportion to all the chickens in cold storage?

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will look at the food survey of June 27, 1919, he will see it shows that the number of storages vary from 124 to 583. They just get such reports as are voluntarily sent them, as I understand it. There are over a thousand of these independent storage concerns, and they constitute about half of all the storage there is, the packers having the other half or more than the other half. So you can see that these figures are merely suggestive of the facts and are not accurate, because they do not contain all of the cold-storage products.

Mr. TOWNSEND. And the probabilities are the amount of cold storage is much greater than that?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, much greater. I imagine instead of 54,000,000 pounds of poultry in cold storage to-day there is something like two or three times that much.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator gave the prices as of June, 1918, and June, 1919.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Are those the wholesale prices or the packers' prices?

Mr. McKELLAR. Those are the wholesale prices. They are prices given here in these papers.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is, they are the prices which the cold-storage people obtain for their eggs?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; the prices which they obtained for their eggs. Of course, the prices which the consumer pays are from 50 to 100 per cent higher than those prices. The producers get much less.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is what I thought. Is the Senator sometime during the course of his discussion going to enlighten us on the question of the difference between the wholesale prices obtained by the packers and the prices paid by the consumers?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am going to attempt to do so. If I get an opportunity, I shall be glad to do it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Before the Senator continues, may I inquire if he has given a list showing the comparative prices, showing what the cold-storage product brings and what the same product brings at the farmyards throughout the country?

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator has asked a very pertinent question, and I shall give an answer that was given me by an employee of the House when I was a Member of the House after I had made a speech on this same subject. This splendid old gentleman had a chicken farm near here. He performed his duties in the House in the daytime, in the afternoon, and on Sundays and at other times raised chickens and sold chickens and eggs. He said to me, after I had finished making my speech, that many farmers around him came into town and bought cold-storage eggs and took them out to the farm, and the next morning brought them back into the city and sold them as fresh eggs. The first three months the eggs are in cold storage that can be done, but there is a difference in prices to which I will gladly call attention in a little while.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I will state the reason why I made that suggestion. With automobiles and autotrucks to-day furnishing rapid transportation within a certain radius around our towns and villages, if the retail prices of the cold-storage product should be so extraordinarily high, I was wondering if the fresh article would not sell at practically the same price from the venders who come into town. That is what I was trying to get at.

Mr. McKELLAR. Before I go further, Mr. President, I wish to insert here the figures on this subject taken from a report of August 7, 1919, of the Federal Trade Commission:

COLD-STORAGE STOCKS.

Eggs: 5,975,000 cases June 1, 1919; 5,440,000 cases June 1, 1918; 1919 stocks were 110 per cent of 1918. Price, June, 1919, fresh (Chicago), $0.40 to $0.40½ per dozen; June, 1918, $0.29 to $0.30½.

Frozen eggs were substantially unchanged—11,306,000 pounds June 1, 1919, against 11,338,000 pounds the June before. No prices secured.

Butter: 30,000,000 pounds this year on June 1; 15,875,000 pounds last year, June 1. This June's stocks are 189 per cent of last June's.

Creamery butter stocks, 1919, were 29,190,222 pounds; 1918 they were 12,749,056 pounds; this June being 229 per cent of last June. Price, creamery, extra (Chicago), June, 1919, $0.53 per pound; June, 1918, $0.41.

Cured beef: About the same this June as last; this June, 25,700,000 pounds, or 103 per cent of last June. Price, salt mess beef (New York), $35 to $36 per barrel, 200 pounds; June, 1918, $32 to $34.

Frozen lamb and mutton: 7,100,000 pounds, or 191 per cent of last June's 3,725,000 pounds. No prices.

Frozen pork: 138,300,000 pounds, or 120 per cent of last June's 115,625,000 pounds. No prices.

Pickled pork: 432,300,000 pounds, or 110 per cent of last June's 394,800,000 pounds. No prices.

Frozen poultry, all kinds: 54,570,000 pounds this June, or 298 per cent of last June's 18,340,000 pounds. Of this total, stocks of frozen fowls were 10,962,670 pounds this June and 2,749,077 pounds last June, this June being 399 per cent of last. Price, frozen fowls (New York), June, 1919, $0.37½ per pound; June, 1918, $0.34½.

Iced poultry (Chicago): Price, June, 1919, $0.31 to $0.32 per pound; June, 1918, $0.27½ to $0.28.

The above cold-storage items are selected ones showing increases; others have decreased.

The total of cold-storage items reported in pounds in June, 1919, and June, 1918 (omitting apples in barrels but covering eggs; frozen eggs; butter; cheese; frozen and cured beef; frozen lamb and mutton; frozen, dry salt, and pickled pork; lard; and frozen poultry), was as follows:

	Pounds.
June 1, 1919	1,671,777,990
June 1, 1918	1,669,826,166

That is, cold-storage stocks this June are 100.1 per cent of those last June.

None of the above figures include Army stores nor the Army excess supply which is to be distributed by the War Department under resolution of the House of Representatives.

The sum of dry storage and cold storage (except apples) for the two periods (combining the figures already given) was as follows:

	Pounds.
June 1, 1919	9,547,058,030
June 1, 1918	8,006,589,671

That is, the total stocks reported on June 1, 1919, were 119 per cent of those on June 1, 1918.

This, as noted, does not include Army supplies.

Grouping the commodities in four classes—

(1) Those increasing in stocks and increasing in price.
(2) Those increasing in stocks and decreasing in price.
(3) Those decreasing in stocks and increasing in price.
(4) Those decreasing in stocks and decreasing in price—

we have the following significant tables, which indicate that the "law of supply and demand" is not working.

Does not the Senator understand that the packers and others interested in eggs, for instance, divide up the country in districts, and only certain concerns are to buy in those districts and only certain prices are to apply? The countryman does not fix the price of eggs, but the price is fixed by the packers.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. But he gets it when he sells eggs at all.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, he gets the price, of course, and should get it. The thing I am complaining of is not that the producer gets too much for his product, but that he does not get enough—that there is too great a difference between what the producer gets and what is charged the consumer.

I am now going to take up specifically the question of eggs. We all know there is a season of plenty and a season of scarcity for eggs. The season of plenty in this neighborhood or this zone of American territory is in May, June, and July, and the season of scarcity is November, December, and January. It varies in various parts of the country. For instance, the principal laying period of hens in Texas is January and February. In Louisiana, Alabama, Mississippi, and Georgia it is February and March. In Tennessee it is April and, to some extent, in May. When we come along to this zone it is in June and July, as I have stated before. Along where the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] lives, it is July and August that comprise the principal laying season of the year. In other words, in a great country producing eggs all over it nature in a way fixes the question of distribution itself, establishes the question itself, settles the question itself, I should say.

Cold storage first began, as applied to eggs, about the year 1900. Before that time it was not in general use. Eggs are kept at about freezing point, or just a little above freezing point. They can be frozen, but they are not usually kept that way.

The bill under consideration provides that they may be kept three months as pure food, and provides a second period of four months when they can be considered as what is termed "second-period cold-storage eggs." These figures are not arbitrary. They are based upon scientific investigation, and that scientific investigation was made by Dr. Harvey W. Wiley in this city in 1910. The method of his investigation was this, that he rented cold-storage space down in Center Market and assembled a lot of the very best quality of eggs, after carefully candling them to see that they were pure, then putting them in cold storage under most scientific principles, and keeping them there three months. At the end of three months he impaneled a jury and took them down there, and they were permitted to eat of the three months storage eggs. The eggs were cooked in various ways.

The members of the jury at the same time were allowed to eat eggs that were fresh and were then asked to determine which were the fresh eggs and which were the cold-storage eggs. Almost without exception there was no way of telling which were the cold-storage eggs and which were the fresh eggs after that period of storage. The jury almost unanimously, in fact unanimously I think, determined that they could not tell the difference at that time. At the end of six months Dr. Wiley again took the jury down and compared, by actual eating, the eggs of six months storage and the fresh eggs, and a majority of the jury could tell which were the cold-storage eggs and which were the fresh eggs. At the end of a period of nine months it was apparent, even before they began to eat the eggs, which were which. Dr. Wiley reported that no egg ought to be kept in cold storage longer than nine months, and he thought even a shorter period should be required.

In order that the matter might be fairly dealt with, it seems to me that during the first three months, as shown by this very carefully arranged experiment, it has been demonstrated that of course they should not be branded. They should not even be branded at all during the first three months except to show the date of their production. At the end of three months they should be branded to show that they are cold-storage eggs. The bill then provides that they can not be sold unless in a container or crate or basket which gives the date of production and shows that they are cold-storage eggs. There is no other practical way to deal with the question. It is best for the health of the people. It prevents the hoarding of eggs indefinitely. They must be sold prior to the time which, under the law, they are declared adulterated.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator will allow me, is there no provision in the pure-food law which would protect the public against the keeping of foodstuffs in cold storage for such a length of time that it becomes unfit for human consumption?

Mr. McKELLAR. As I understand it, the Department of Agriculture reports that there is no method of ascertaining that. They have no right of inspection; they have no right to go in and see whether the foodstuffs are properly kept and stored or not.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Have they not the right to inspect the food that is put on the market?

Mr. McKELLAR. Perhaps so, but you can see where that would lead. It was believed by Dr. Wiley and those associated with him that this was the proper way to deal with the matter. I believe that possibly the length of the second period of the cold storage of eggs might be extended a month, so that it would be eight instead of seven months, in order to carry eggs over the period of scarcity in the winter, so that the public would get everything out of cold storage they are entitled to get and should get, but they should not be allowed to keep those eggs indefinitely.

I understand that they keep eggs in cold storage, controlling the market all the time, and when they get bad they put them through a drying process and sell them in the dried form, and in that way palm them off on the public. The proposed bill will prevent such things, and I will tell you why it will prevent it. The packers know it will be prevented. By the way, you gentlemen will see representatives of the packers in reference to this bill before it goes very much further. They are here in Washington—their agents are here—and they will be around to call on you. You will all be told that they are doing now just what the bill requires and that there is no use to regulate them. They will tell you they are not manipulating prices, that they are not dividing up the territory. I refer you to the report of the Federal Trade Commission, which shows that they are dividing up the territory and that they are combining. The best means they have of combining and hoarding is cold storage, because they can withhold, practically without cost, food from the market whenever they want to and at all times. It gives them every opportunity to manipulate the price. Do you doubt that they use this opportunity?

I come next to the question of poultry. There are two reasons why this bill ought to pass in respect to poultry. In the first place, poultry is not properly prepared for cold storage now. It is not properly killed, it is not properly picked, it is not properly handled. I want to explain the process that is in vogue now. The head is not taken off of poultry now, but the fowl is simply killed by being cut in the neck. It is not bled. It is not drawn. The insides are not taken out when it is put in cold storage. The feathers are not taken off. They are not cooled as nature would cool them and according to scientific processes, but they are killed by inserting a knife in their neck, and when that method is used they are not bled properly, and they are immediately thrown into a cooling room, and then deposited in large vaults just as they are. When they are taken out of cold storage to be placed on the market this thing occurs: They are taken out and dumped into hot water and scalded, and the feathers taken off in that way and the skin torn, according to the expert witnesses on that subject. The skin is torn and the hot water has the effect of swelling the fowl and making it look like a fresh fowl. In addition to that, the head is left on it, and the fowl deteriorates very rapidly after having been treated in that way. Even the retail men put these fowls in hot or warm water to make them swell out and look like fresh fowls and, incidentally, to gather greater weight. You who love poultry, do you not think we had better regulate these processes? At all events, should we not see that the people are not imposed upon—that they actually get what they buy and pay for?

As a matter of fact Dr. Pennington, who is an expert on that subject, says that the chicken should be properly bled; that it should be dry-picked; that it should be dry-cooled; that it should not be put into hot water at all; and that the skin should not be made to puff out, as it will by the application of water. One of the effects of the practice is, as I said before, that it makes the fowl look like a fresh fowl temporarily until it can be sold, and the other is that it adds weight. For that reason a fowl ought not to be kept long, and there ought to be regulations as to its being placed in storage.

Senators are familiar with the facts and figures as to fowls placed in cold storage. In many instances they are kept there indefinitely. We are given impure food, and the price of fowls is absolutely controlled by the organizations to which I have referred. Now I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I dislike very much to interrupt the Senator from Tennessee, for he is making a very interesting argument, but I want to call his attention to section 5 of the food-control act.

Mr. McKELLAR. That act was called to my attention on yesterday. I am perfectly familiar with it. I understand there have been two prosecutions under it and that both prosecutions have failed because the law was not specific enough to convict anyone under it, as has been held in some cases down in Texas. If the Senator will remember, when that law was passed two years ago, I endeavored to insert the bill I am now advocating as a part of it and was outvoted. It is just a question of whether we want to pass a law that will control or whether we want to pass a general provision like the one which is contained in the pure-food act, which means nothing to anybody.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator from Tennessee will permit me, I want to call his attention to the fact that section 5 of the food-control law does provide for licensing. It gives the President of the United States authority to provide for a licensing system and for an accounting system.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; during the war.

Mr. GRONNA. I think the Senator is mistaken in saying that there is no provision in the law compelling reports to be made to the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think there is no doubt about it.

Mr. GRONNA. Then, if the Senator will remember, section 6 of that law provides the penalty; it provides that anyone who hoards—and it uses the broadest term imaginable; it uses the term "necessaries"—shall be subject to a fine of $5,000 or imprisonment for a term of two years. I am simply calling the attention of the Senator to this, because I think the RECORD ought to show that there is on the statute books to-day ample provision for an accounting and licensing system, and that no individual and no corporation can transact business in interstate commerce unless they do so under a license. Does not the Senator from Tennessee agree with me on that?

Mr. McKELLAR. Not entirely. I agree with the Senator about a law having been passed, but that law can no longer be enforced.

Mr. GRONNA. And the law is in force.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have that law before me, but it is not being enforced. I think during the war the very people who controlled the situation—that is to say, the packers—were being appealed to to furnish all the foodstuffs possible. They control the situation under the existing law. My purpose is to secure the enactment of a law that will control the packers and not a law that will permit the packers to control the situation, as was done under the food-control law.

I am sure the Senator from North Dakota can see the difference between those two propositions. I believe that under the law of two years ago the packers were given authority to control the products and the prices which the American people had to pay for the products that went to their hands; but under this proposed law the American people will control the packers. That, in my judgment, is the difference between the existing law and the proposed law.

Mr. GRONNA. I am not finding any fault with the law which is proposed by the Senator from Tennessee, but, if the Senator will permit me, I want to read merely a few lines of section 5 of the food-control act.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be very glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. GRONNA. As I understand, that law is still in full force and effect.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know whether it is or not. Indeed, in a practical sense it is not.

Mr. GRONNA. I am quite sure it is.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the Food Administration has to a great extent been dissolved by reason of the fact that that law was a temporary measure for the war; and, as I understand, practically no appropriations were made for the continuation of the Food Administration or, at any rate, only very small appropriations were made, surely not sufficient to carry out the provisions of the law to which the Senator refers. As a matter of fact, that law was a war-time measure, and was badly enforced during the war, I think, and especially in so far as hoarding and profiteering were concerned. I regret that was the case; I regret that the law was framed as it was. It ought to have been framed more specifically and it ought to have been framed to prevent these abuses for all time. But if the Senator believes in that law and believes that that law was effective, surely he will vote for this proposed law, which does exactly the same thing, and does it more effectively and does it specifically.

Mr. GRONNA. I simply want to call attention to a provision of the law.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have it before me; I am very familiar with it. I voted for it and helped to pass it, and I am not sure I acted wisely in doing so.

Mr. GRONNA. It gives the President of the United States all necessary authority.

Mr. McKELLAR. During the war.

Mr. GRONNA. During the war; and let me remind the Senator that this morning I received a letter from the Attorney General accompanied with a bill proposing to amend this law.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is true; and the law will not only have to be amended but we shall have to furnish money to carry out its provisions, if it is to be revived and used. The law already on the statute books is a war measure. I read from it as follows:

> That by reason of the existence of a state of war it is essential to the national security and defense, for the successful prosecution of the war and for the support and maintenance of the Army and Navy, to assure an adequate supply and to facilitate the movement and equitable distribution of food—

And so on—foods, feeds, and fuel are what the law applies to, and, of course, that is sufficient in a general way; but the Senator knows that not only has the Army practically been demobilized and the Navy largely demobilized but that Congress has cut off the appropriation for the Food Administration, and the Food Administration itself has been demobilized and is not in a position, unless an additional appropriation is authorized, to enforce the present law. This is shown by the request of the Attorney General.

The purpose of my bill is not to provide a war measure, not to provide the immense machinery to carry out a war measure, but a very simple, adequate law to effect the purpose provided in the bill, which is to prevent hoarding, profiteering, manipulation of prices and the like by an improper and wicked use of cold storage——

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator maintains that the food-control law has ceased to exist, there is no use to argue the question. I contend that it has not.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator's contention that it has not ceased to exist may be technically right, but practically it is wholly wrong, for the reason that there can not be an enforcement of the law unless we have a Food Administration to carry it out and the money with which to carry it out. His party has cut off the necessary appropriations.

Mr. GRONNA. Oh, yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. And the Senator knows that we have not such an administration.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator from Tennessee is a good lawyer, but he is absolutely mistaken in that, for it is a law which imposes the duty upon the President of the United States and not upon the Food Administration.

Mr. McKELLAR. The President himself does not personally enforce the law. This was never contemplated. Congress has got to give him means with which to enforce it, and has not done so. The last appropriation for the Food Administration was just some trifling amount to close up its affairs; that is all. It did not provide for the enforcement of the law. That law is a thing of the past. It may be revived by Congress, but until it is revived and money appropriated to carry out its provisions, we can not get anywhere with it. The President can not enforce it unless it is made applicable to present conditions, and the money given him with which to enforce it.

Mr. GRONNA. It is true, as the Senator says, that some of the men who were employed under the Food Administration have ceased their labors there, but I do not think the Senator is correct in assuming——

Mr. McKELLAR. Some of them! About 95 per cent of them, I am advised.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not think the Senator is correct in assuming that the office of the food controller has ceased to exist.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not think we have a food controller. Mr. Hoover resigned, and I have never heard of a successor to him being appointed.

Mr. GRONNA. How are we operating to control the grain situation if the Food Administration is not functioning, I will ask the Senator?

Mr. McKELLAR. There was a special appropriation made for that purpose, but the official in charge of the Grain Corporation, as the Senator knows, is under a special provision and he is only the controller of grain. That particular part of the food controller's job was continued under the construction of the law that the Government control of the grain situation runs until next June.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. And it was seen fit to continue the grain administrator to carry out the law. All the other functions of the Food Administration, however, were ended. Congress has not appropriated money to continue them, and surely the President ought not to be criticized for not enforcing a law when Congress has given neither the money nor the men with which to enforce it. It is unfair for you gentlemen to withhold from him the necessary appropriations to enforce it and then blame him for not enforcing it.

Mr. GRONNA. Does the Senator believe, then, that the food-control commissioner is to-day out of office?

Mr. McKELLAR. My understanding is that Mr. Hoover resigned some time ago, and there has been no successor to him, because the food-control act was purely a war measure and has performed its mission and is out of commission.

Mr. GRONNA. Of course, the Senator knows that the President had ample funds—he had the control of $100,000,000 during the war—which he might use for any purpose that he saw fit.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know whether the President has any of this fund on hand yet or not. I do not think there has been any such fund appropriated this year. The former fund expired on July 1, as the Senator knows. My recollection is that the Food Administration spent $100,000,000 in possibly a week while it was acting under the food-control law; but, as a matter of fact, there is no doubt in the world that, while the food-control act may still technically be the law, because we have not formally ratified the treaty, substantially it is not the law, because there are no means with which to enforce it. I wish to say to the Senator that it might cost hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars—perhaps $1,000,000,000—to continue the food-control act in existence all along the line, and I think such legislation would be very unwise. I may say that it will probably take $100,000 to carry out the provisions of the proposed law I am advocating, and which will be much more effective for the purpose indicated.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not disagree with the Senator, and I wish to apologize for disturbing him.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad to have the Senator interrupt me. The question to which he has referred has been raised heretofore; it was raised in the House committee the other day; and I am delighted to have the privilege of stating just what the facts are and just what the law is, so that the country may know that there has been no dereliction in not having some provision under which this subject may be handled and to show that certainly there has been no dereliction on the part of the President.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator must admit that up to the 30th day of June there were ample funds supplied to the food-control commissioner, because several hundred thousand dollars which were not expended went back to the Treasury.

Mr. McKELLAR. I so understand.

Mr. GRONNA. Up to the 1st of July, at least, there were ample funds for the prosecution of any persons who violated the law.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think so, and I think they ought to have been prosecuted. I agree with the Senator, and I think it is very unfortunate that no such action was taken.

However, I understand that the food-control act was so defective in its definitions and in its penalties that wherever prosecutions have taken place under it the Government has failed to make out a case. When this provision of the food-control law was passed I believed that it would be ineffective, and the courts have substantiated the position that I took about the matter at the time. When we deal with profiteers and hoarders and manipulators of prices we are obliged to be specific in the laws which we pass; otherwise they will escape. They have the best legal talent in the country employed to look after their affairs, and we can not be too careful when we enact these laws that they are so worded as to have the effect intended.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand that the food-control act has not been repealed.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; but it has been practically nullified.

Mr. SIMMONS. But the organization has been practically disbanded.

Mr. McKELLAR. It has been practically disbanded.

Mr. SIMMONS. No appropriation was made for the administration of the food bureau, because none was asked. Is not that the truth?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not think that any was asked. I am not sure. It was not expected to keep it in operation, and it ought not to have been kept in operation; it ought to have been wound up as soon as possible. The moment the dilatory Senate—if I may so speak of it, and as I am a Member of it perhaps I have the right to speak of it in that way—acts upon the treaty of peace and ratifies the treaty of peace, as it ought to have been ratified a month or six weeks ago, for there is no possible excuse for not having ratified it, the food-control act passes out of existence. That is what was intended, and that is as it should be. It was not necessary and it was not intended to keep up this great organization of men in the food-control department to carry out the provisions of the law after the war was over. The country would not have stood for it in times of peace.

Mr. SIMMONS. But no appropriation was asked, because——

Mr. McKELLAR. There was a small appropriation asked and allowed, as I recall.

Mr. SIMMONS. That was merely to keep up a skeleton organization.

Mr. McKELLAR. That was all.

Mr. SIMMONS. An amount was appropriated for administering the legislation with reference to wheat, but practically no appropriation was made for keeping up the food-control organization, as I understand.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is true.

Mr. SIMMONS. Because, under the conditions that then obtained and under the conditions that were thought likely to occur, it was believed to be no longer necessary to continue that organization. My understanding is that that situation has changed, and that it is now felt necessary and expedient either to continue this old organization or to substitute for it something as good or better.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is my understanding.

Mr. SIMMONS. But as long as the present act is in force, and as long as we are in a state of war—that is to say, until peace has been concluded—the President has authority at any time to recreate this organization. That is true?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. So that there is no trouble about authority on the part of the administration to establish this organization as long as we are technically at war with Germany, and the only thing lacking is money with which to do it. The power exists.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is true. This Congress has not given the money, and the President can not carry it out without the money. The President is not expected to carry it out himself personally.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, does the Senator want a food administration in this country any longer than these conditions of war obtain?

Mr. McKELLAR. Not at all. I think what we ought to do is to pass laws——

Mr. SIMMONS. Then, if that is the Senator's idea, what is the necessity of further legislation with reference to a food administration?

Mr. McKELLAR. I think there is none.

Mr. SIMMONS. Why not simply appropriate the money and let the matter rest where it is now?

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator means not to pass a law regulating cold storage?

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not referring to cold storage at all.

Mr. McKELLAR. I assume not.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. That brings up the question as to whether or not there ought to be some amendment to this law to make it more effective.

Mr. McKELLAR. You would have to have some amendment to make it meet present conditions, and you must appropriate money to enforce it.

Mr. FLETCHER. For instance, as to penalties there is a defect in the law.

Mr. McKELLAR. There have been no convictions under it, as I understand, because the penalties are so arranged that a judge can not even construe them. My own judgment was—and I think I made the statement on the floor of the Senate at the time—that those provisions, if passed, would be wholly inadequate; that the bill virtually turned over the food supply of the country to the packers of the country, and that is what was largely done. The packers had absolute control all during the war of the food supply of this country, so far as meats, chickens, eggs, and things of that sort are concerned—those things that go into cold storage—and, by the way, they are reaching out to control practically everything that goes into cold storage.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was going to suggest further to the Senator that not only ought certain provisions with regard to penalties be strengthened and amended, but there are references in the act, for instance, to "persons" doing this, that, and the other, and it does not cover corporations, organizations, and associations.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is true; at least the courts have so held.

Mr. FLETCHER. So those changes ought to be made if the law is to remain.

Mr. McKELLAR. If we are to amend that act, then the changes suggested by the Senator must be made; but I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that what we need is peace-time legislation to cure certain evils in this situation. Now, we need not make any mistake about it; and that brings me to the very crux of this question. We need not make any mistake about it. It is a question of whether Congress is going to control this country, in so far as its food supply is concerned, or whether the packers are going to control it—the five great packers of Chicago. We might as well reach the question right now; and I want to tell you Senators at this minute, right here in Washington the packers have a lobby, and that lobby is vigorous and active, and it is going to be up to you, and you individually as well as collectively, because they are going to appeal to you to defeat just such legislation as this, which will regulate them and make them do the right and fair thing toward the producers and consumers of this country.

As it is now, according to a late report of the Federal Trade Commission, the five packers control 82.2 per cent of the cattle of the country, 76.6 per cent of the calves, 61.2 per cent of the hogs, and 86.4 per cent of the sheep and lambs. They control poultry and eggs almost in the same way, and butter, and everything that goes on the table, and canned goods, and the by-products of all these great primary products are controlled absolutely by the packers of this country; and through cold storage they are enabled absolutely not only to control the products themselves, but to control the prices, because they can put them on the market at will, and after they are once put in cold storage it costs very little to keep them in cold storage. Take poultry: If you keep it alive it is expensive. You have got to feed it; you have got to care for it. You put it into cold storage, and there it lies until you want to use it. The cost is relatively small. That is shown here. The packers' control of prices is shown here in the figures. There was three times as much surplus poultry on June 1, 1919, as there was on June 1, 1918, and yet the price goes up.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope the Senator will wait just a moment, and then I shall be very glad to yield.

Mr. REED. Why, certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to continue about this matter for a moment. The law of supply and demand has ceased to operate. The time has passed for us to take halfway measures. The fight is on, and one of the representatives of the packers told me it was on. It is a question of whether the Senate is going to line up with the packers or whether it is going to line up with the people; and by "the people" I mean the producers as well as the consumers, because there is a vast difference between the prices paid the producers for what they produce and the prices charged to the consumers for the meat when it leaves the packers' hands.

Right here I want to say that the packers are making a special appeal to the producers of the country because the prices paid the producers are much larger than the prices formerly paid in the prewar period. That is true, but the prices paid to the producers are fixed by the packers and are wholly inadequate in comparison with what the packers receive for the finished products, as these figures heretofore quoted show the prices that the packers get are extortionate, and then we find that the prices at which the wholesalers sell provide for an immense profit, and the retailers make a large profit, so that by the time the food products get to the consumers it is almost impossible for the consumer to get enough money to pay.

The profiteers are the middlemen; the profiteers are not the hog raisers and the poultry raisers. They are not the farmers.

If an effective cold-storage law is passed, restoring the law of supply and demand as provided in this bill, if an effective law against monopoly and against hoarding and against the fixing of prices, against the division of territory in which the packers buy, and against dividing up the territory in which they sell, as provided in this bill, is passed, then the producers will necessarily get more for their products, and the consumers will have to pay less for them. The inevitable effect of such enactments as provided in this bill will be to cut down the profits of the profiteering middlemen, and this is what we should do.

Why, according to the testimony this country is divided up into districts, and one packer has charge of one district, and he may not buy or sell outside of that district without the consent of the others. The prices are fixed by gentlemen's agreements. The farmer has nothing to do with fixing the price of his products. The packers fix the price; and I tell you, Senators, they are getting exceedingly bold about it. If a man undertakes to have an independent view they undertake to discipline him, by fair means or foul.

I expressed some views here to the effect that the packers ought to be regulated, and what is the result? Every bank with which they do business, every business man with whom they do business that they can possibly lay their hands on, has been writing me from Tennessee, and saying, "Hold off the packers—hold off the packers!"

I read here a few days ago a resolution of the Middle Tennessee Cattle Raisers' Association, virtually instructing me not to vote for the Kenyon and Kendrick bills, regulatory of the packers. I wrote my friends in Tennessee and told them that I did not agree with them; that I could not see the matter as they saw it. The men who signed that resolution are men well known to me, among the very best men in Tennessee; honorable men. I could not imagine what was the matter—why that sort of a resolution was passed, and I told them that I knew that no packer's agent had dictated to them; and here is an answer that I want to read:

"SPRING HILL, TENN.,
August 8, 1919.

"Hon. K. D. MCKELLAR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

"DEAR SIR: Replying to your inquiry as to the intent and subject of the Middle Tennessee Farmers' Institute in adopting the resolution in regard to the Kenyon and Kendrick bills: At meetings of the institute all resolutions are turned in to a committee, who first consider them before putting them before the members as a whole.

"I did not get to the meeting until nearly noon of the second day. I was asked by the president to serve on the resolutions committee in place of a member called away. Talking to the president at the time was a Mr. Burnett, to whom I was introduced. Mr. Burnett was evidently discussing the matter at the time, as some one in the party suggested that he draw the resolution and hand it in for consideration. He went into the office where there was a typewriter and drew the resolution and handed it to me as a member of the committee—and the only one there at the time. As I remember, Mr. Burnett told me he was in the employ of the Union Stock Yards at Nashville and had been with a packing company. Just after dinner most of the members went out to the experiment station. Mr. Harvey Whitfield, the chairman, of Clarksville, Tenn., and I were the only members of committee who remained to work on the resolutions. When we came to the Kenyon resolution, I said: 'I am not posted as to the merits or demerits of this bill.' Mr. Whitfield said: 'I am not.' So we laid it aside, shaped up the rest of the resolutions, and waited. I don't know that Mr. Dunklin, a member, ever saw this resolution at all. When Mr. Homer Hancock, of Lebanon, or Wilson County, came in, we called his attention to this resolution. Whitfield and I understood from him that he was familiar with the bills, and he was under the impression that it was a move on the part of the large packers to hamper building plants in the South."

And, by the way, I was served with notice in the same way. Some packing plants have been established in my State, and I was served with notice that if I did not watch out no more packing plants would be established in my State. [Reading:]

"Also, that it would interfere with the dairy industry of the South (which is now growing at a marvelous rate). And it was from these impressions the resolution was submitted to the members. There was no discussion on any part of the resolution, the members having faith in the committee, and the committee thinking the bills would work a great damage to southern interests.

"You know the effect these bills will have much better than did we. Therefore, in my opinion, it is your duty to follow your own judgment, being in close touch and familiar with all the bearings of the bills.

"You are at liberty to use this letter when and where you like.

"Truly, yours,

"SAM. N. WARREN."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

Mr. MCKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The Senator is making a protest against the hoarding of food products by the packers and providing means to make them disgorge. If the Senator will allow me, there are just six lines in the food-control bill that I should like to read and ask him if he thinks this covers it.

Mr. MCKELLAR. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] has just read that into the RECORD, and I have myself read it into the RECORD. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that while the food-control bill may be technically the law, no appropriation has been made for the President to carry it out. I repeat that. It is merely a war-time measure. The time of its operation is limited, and we have got to have other legislation; and, indeed, the Attorney General has recommended that we amend it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. But this paragraph provides that suits can be brought in any one of the Federal courts; and surely you do not need an appropriation to enable people to bring suits in the Federal courts.

Mr. MCKELLAR. The Senator was not in the Chamber at the time, but it has been disclosed here by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] and from such information as I had that the only indictments that have been brought were dismissed, for two reasons. One was because the penalty was not one that could be carried out and the other one was that this act only referred to persons and not to corporations, and therefore it has been held that it did not apply to the packers, and the packers are the principal malefactors, in my judgment.

Now, I want to read a portion of another letter from one of the others:

"The subject of regulation of the packers was presented to the meeting by Mr. Burnett, who is a representative of the packers at Nashville, and who is identified with the local stockyards. He did not have even a copy of the bills with him, but made verbal statement of the contents of the bills and presented the packers side of the case. He frequently referred to price fixing of foodstuffs by the Government and to the costly experiment or necessity of the Government operation of railroads during the war and succeeded in creating the impression that the Government was going to practically take over the packing industry. He introduced the resolution which was passed and it was considered by the resolutions committee in a perfunctory way. Not a member of the committee, I am informed, had ever seen a copy of the bills, but voted to recommend the resolution to the meeting on Mr. Burnett's statement of the case."

This letter was from one of the leading citizens of Tennessee, as in the case of Mr. Warren. This last letter is from a colonel who has lately returned from France. He is one of the largest farmers in my State.

Mr. President, I want to say that I resent the action of these five packers and their agents going to my State and attempting to get up a propaganda of instructions as to how I shall vote on questions here. The very best men in my State have been misled by that propaganda, and when submitted to them they invariably come back with the statement that they were instigated by representatives of the packing industry. If this goes on in every State, if this goes on in Washington here, what will happen is that we will not have legislation on this most important subject where legislation is so vitally necessary. These packers are fighting this bill, they have been fighting it all the time, ever since it was introduced, and my recollection is that one of them stated to me it was a fight to the finish. I welcome the fight. I say it is a fight to the finish. The question is whether this Senate and whether this Congress is going to be dominated by these five men who are dealing in the food of the Nation. There may be some excuse for letting them combine and hoard and monopolize during the war, but it seems to me to be a monstrous thing when we permit five institutions of this country to control absolutely the foods of the United States while we are in the midst of the greatest plenty of every kind of food product. There is more wheat on hand, perhaps, than ever before in the history of this country; there is more beef, more pork, more poultry, more eggs, more of everything which we eat, and yet the prices are higher. The war is over, and yet the prices continue to ascend; and why? It is because the foodstuffs of this country are in this gigantic monopoly, whose members are profiteering, and in that way they enable those with whom they deal to profiteer. The question has come down to this, whether America is going to control the packers or whether the packers are going to control America, because any institution which controls the foodstuffs of this country will absolutely control the country. They are controlling the country now and making it pay tribute to them.

Did you ever think of the immense difference between the price the producer receives and the price the consumer pays? I think there have been more tomatoes grown this year than ever before in our history. This is the period of the greatest plenty. This is the period of the highest production. And yet if you buy tomatoes to-day you pay the same price you paid in the winter time, in the period of greatest scarcity during a great war. The law of supply and demand, in so far as foodstuffs are concerned, is no longer in force. It has been absolutely abrogated by the great packers of the country controlling the foodstuffs of our country and of other countries.

They not only control the foodstuffs of this country but they are reaching out and controlling the foodstuffs of other countries—foreign countries like Canada, Argentina, and Australia. Where is it going to end? When their agents come here and impudently tell Senators of the United States that it is a fight to the finish, what are you going to do about it? Are you going to let the challenge go? Are we going to let them control or are we going to be men enough to control this organization? In my judgment, there ought not to be any organization in this country stronger than our Government. Some 50 or 60 years ago it was thought that another institution in this country was stronger than our Government, but it was found that they were mistaken about it, and these packers are going to be mistaken about their strength. They may think that for a season they are stronger than this Government, but the time will come when they will be regulated as they ought to be regulated.

I have nothing whatever against the packers. I just want to make them do right. If they are putting up these foodstuffs fairly and properly now, so that the public health will not be injured; if they are paying a reasonable price to the producer and charging a reasonable price to the consumer, there is no harm done by this bill. If they are doing an honest business, how can they object to regulation by the Government?

Mr. President, I want to call attention to two or three provisions of the bill which are departures from the bill as introduced by the late Senator Heyburn. They are found in sections 11 and 12. I will read section 11:

SEC. 11. That any agreement, express or implied, verbal or written, so-called gentleman's or agent's, secret or open, by and between two or more persons, partnerships, firms, corporations, or associations of persons or corporations, engaged in buying or selling said cold-storage products, or engaged in the cold-storage business, whether as owner of such cold-storage plants and engaged in dealing in said food products or whether as owners of said storage plants for hire, when such products are the subject of interstate commerce or are intended for interstate commerce, by which agreement or understanding any of the above-mentioned and set forth articles of food kept in cold storage are to be stored for a longer or shorter period, or are to be sold or withheld from sale, in whole or in part, for the purpose of affecting the purchase price or selling price of such articles of food, is hereby prohibited and declared unlawful, and upon conviction shall subject the offender to a fine of not less than $1,000 or more than $10,000 and imprisonment of not less than one year or more than 10 years.

If the conduct of those who are engaged in this business is not violative of the proposed law, how can they object to it? The Federal Trade Commission has reported that they are in combination, that they control the prices, fix the prices, agree upon them in various ways, and they point out in their report how it is done. They fix the prices at which they buy and fix the prices at which they sell, and indefinite cold storage gives them the right to keep at will. Why should they not be regulated? Why should they be allowed to keep eggs for one year or two years, and let them spoil, in many instances, rather than to put them on the market for the people? Why should they not be forced, periodically at least, to put these foods on the market? We see in the papers constantly where immense stores of poultry and immense stores of eggs are being dumped somewhere because they have been kept in cold storage too long and can not be put on as food. This is a crime in morals, anyway. Many States have passed these laws, including New Jersey, Massachusetts, New York, and Indiana, and they have tried to pass them elsewhere, but the packers have kept them from being passed. I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD these laws. The packers have lobbies everywhere in the country fighting these laws, and when the laws are passed in the States it has been held by many of the courts that they are ineffective for this reason, that once the character of interstate commerce has been fixed upon the goods, it is fixed until it goes to the consumer, and the States have not the right to legislate on that subject, it is violative of the Constitution; and such acts have been abortive and are made of no effect because of that plea. Yet they will come here and tell you, "Let the States act. They have made food laws in this State and that State. Why not let the States act?"

Senators, the only way you can effectively deal with them is along the lines of this bill, regulate them under the Federal commerce clause, and whenever you do you have done the work, and you have restored the law of supply and demand that has been abrogated by the packers, you will have successfully dealt with the hoarders and profiteers. Cold storage is the greatest, the most beneficent, discovery of the age, probably. It is being misused by those who deal in it to prey upon the people and to profiteer upon the people in the matter of food. We talk about our laws. We pass laws for the protection of almost every conceivable thing in this country. And yet that thing that is more important to the human race than anything else, food, we allow to be absolutely controlled by five concerns in Chicago. Is it right? No wonder there is unrest in this country, when it is known, as it is known, that these five great corporate bodies in Chicago absolutely control the food products of the country, with food rising higher and higher and higher all the time. How are you going to stop it? There is but one way, and that is to restore the law of supply and demand, and make these packers obey the law.

Mr. President, the packers will tell you, when you argue this way, that you are arguing against the farmer, that you are arguing against the producer. I think we know better than that. Surely we know that there is such a discrepancy between what the farmer actually gets and what the packer or the middleman gets that there must be something wrong in that argument. Just let me illustrate it:

I bought last night at a fruit stand two large peaches for a nickel. I was rather surprised that I could get them that cheap. They were quite as much as you would get at any first-class hotel under an order of peaches and cream. The hotel bought probably quite as cheaply as the fruit vendor down on the corner. Assuming that they did, the two peaches could not have cost more than 4 cents; maybe much less. And yet at a first-class hotel, with cream which is served with the peaches probably not costing over 1 cent, they charge you for peaches and cream 50 or 60 cents. I know at one of the hotels it is as high as 60 cents in this city. There ought to be some regulation. We can make that regulation in the District of Columbia. It is made in this bill. Let us try it out here. It is easy to ascertain here the profits of the packers, the profits of the wholesalers, the profits of the retailers, because there is no question of lack of power in the Congress to deal with these questions here. I understand the District Committee of the Senate is dealing with these questions. I hope they will ascertain the facts.

Did you ever think of the frozen food in cold storage these days; over 200 articles of food of every conceivable kind in cold storage? The storage people are absolutely in control of putting it on the market and controlling the price whenever put there.

Senators, it is an important matter. This bill affords an effective way of dealing with the subject. It will be the most effective way of reducing the high cost of living. We ought to pass it. We ought not to be deterred by lobbyists, but we ought to come forward and vote for the people, and it seems to me it is a question for every man in this Senate to determine whether he is going to vote with the lobbyists of the packers or whether he is going to vote for the American people on this vital question of the high cost of living.

I speak plainly, for that is the issue. We will be compelled to meet it, whether we think so or not. The people of this country will force us to meet it.

Some years ago, when prices were about one-third as high as they are now, and I had this bill up before the House, nearly every newspaper in this country wrote an editorial commending the proposition. I want to insert many editorials from leading papers of the country as a part of my remarks, showing that public sentiment is behind the proposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts in the chair). Without objection, is is so ordered.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, we must not deceive ourselves. It is a plain question whether we are going to obey public sentiment, the demand for lower prices, the demand that we shall not bow down to the packing interests of this country, to the hoarders of food, to the monopolists of food, to the profiteers, but that we shall give the people and all the people a fair deal. As between the packers, the monopolists, the hoarders, and the profiteers on the one side and the American people on the other, I declare myself right now for the American people.

The people of the United States are expecting action on this question. They are not expecting delay. We are delaying too many things in this body. Several months ago the President of the United States was pilloried here because his opponents claimed it took him so long to effect a treaty of peace involving the destinies of the whole world, and yet after that treaty of peace had been entered into and submitted to this body, with nothing to do but to ratify, amend, or reject it, a period of over two months has elapsed and no action has been taken, as I understand it, except the reading of the treaty in the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. The whole country waits while the treaty is slowly read. The business men of this country, the plain people of this country, want action on that treaty. They want to be restored to normal times. There is not a Senator here who does not know how he is going to vote on that treaty. There is no reason for delaying the vote; there is no reason for keeping the people of the country in a state of unrest. Business wants to know what is going to happen. Financial men want the matter settled. All people want to know what they are going to do, and they are criticizing the Senate because of its delay. The delay has been too long. It is time we should get rid of the treaty. I say we ought to vote on it, and then we ought to take up these domestic questions—questions like the high cost of living. We all understand the remedy. Let us kick out the profiteers and their agents from the Capitol and let us go boldly forward and do our duty as legislators, and thus quiet the unrest that must come unless action is had.

The American people want to put these things behind them. Our boys have won the greatest war that mankind ever engaged in. We want to have the matter settled. The fruits of that victory should be established. The people of this country should be permitted to go about their usual ways, into their usual vocations and avocations, and an end put to all this unrest. We should settle that peace question and we should settle the railroad question. We are dilatory about that. There is no report from any committee as to what is to be done with the railroads. No wonder many plans are being introduced and talked about. No wonder there is a spirit of unrest over that question. It is our duty to put the railroads back into the hands of the owners like they were before the war, and as quickly as possible, and when we do it we will stop a lot of unrest about that subject.

We are entirely too dilatory. We need action upon this greatest of all domestic questions, action upon this tremendous cost of food to the people. It meets every man, woman, and child in the country face to face every day. The Senate is dilatory; the Senate investigates, and the Senate debates. The Senate adjourns for a day or days at a time. The House adjourns for days at a time. No real business is being done in either House, and the country is standing still while we delay here. It is an unpardonable situation. Let us put an end to talking, let us put an end to investigation, and let us get down to business and pass these measures that we know are going to be passed. We ought to pass them in 30 days and leave here. There is no reason in the world why the peace treaty should be delayed. There is no reason in the world why the railroad question should be delayed. There is no reason in the world why this cold-storage question should be delayed. There is no reason why we should not deal with the hoarders and profiteers. We know the facts. We have investigated to our fullest capacity to investigate, and we ought to get busy and do something. I am prepared to vote, and I am for voting on all these measures. The best way, if we have differences among ourselves, is to vote them down or vote them up. We can not settle them except by voting. Let us get to the voting stage and earn the praise and commendation of the American people, and we will do it if we will take active steps, and if we do not take active steps we are going to be held responsible for the conditions which must necessarily arise by lack of action or by delay in action, by the continuous story of investigation, by the continuous story of one side abusing the other—Democrats abusing Republicans for this thing and that thing and the other thing and Republicans abusing Democrats for not having done this, that, or the other. The people are not interested in whether Republicans get the advantage for next year's election or whether the Democrats get the advantage. These three questions are all important to them: They want this country put on a peace basis, they want the railroads restored and regulated, and, finally, they want the high cost of living reduced and the hoarders and profiteers punished.

We are all Americans. If we have differences of opinion let us get together here in the Senate and settle those differences of opinion. Let us legislate for the people awhile, if we have been legislating or trying to legislate for party. Why, in this very debate before the House committee and here in the Senate I have been asked the question if a law passed for war time only ought not to be enforced, with the evident purpose of trying to throw the blame on the President of the United States. Senators, let us quit that kind of quibbling. We all know there is no law in force, and our quibbling about it gives the greatest pleasure to our packer friends, our monopolistic friends, our hoarding friends, our profiteering friends, for they do not want anything better than the trouble and discord over remedies. They want to fan the flames of factional trouble and strife. Surely we ought to have sense enough to know that the only people that can be benefited by factional strife in the Senate, whether over the treaty, whether over the league of nations, whether over the high cost of living, or whether over the railroads, or what not, while we are quarreling about it, are the hoarders and the profiteers, who are laughing in their sleeves at the Senate of the United States.

APPENDIX.

PACKERS ARE BUYING EGGS—ARMOUR HAS PURCHASED 150 CARS OF STORAGE STOCK—PRICES HAVE BEEN BOOSTED 1 TO 1½ CENTS—PACKERS PAYING ABOUT 28 CENTS F. O. B.—STEADY UPWARD TREND TO MARKET.

CHICAGO, November 21.

Heavy buying by the beef packers in the stock yards has boosted the storage-egg market 1 to 1½ cents. Although the packers put away a large block of eggs in the spring, they have been free sellers and late last week came into the market and since that time have bought several hundred cars of eggs. Armour & Co. are reported to have bought over 150 cars. The packers have not only been buying eggs stored in Chicago, but have gone also to coolers in Nebraska, Kansas, and Iowa. It is reported that Armour bought eggs at Hastings, Nebr.; Lincoln, Nebr.; Sioux City, Iowa; Omaha, Topeka, Abilene, and other points.

Charles B. Ford is reported to have been the heavier seller to the packers. Gossip has it that Mr. Ford has sold over 100 cars of storage eggs within the past week, and one sale of 25 cars to Armour & Co. is rumored. Fifteen cars of these eggs are said to be at Hastings, Nebr., and 10 at Lincoln. The price paid is reported to be 28 cents storing point. Early this week Mr. Ford sold a car of Aprils at what is the record high price thus far this season. A local jobber paid him 28 cents for a car of his Rochelle packed eggs. Among the large blocks sold by shippers is the reported sale of a block of about 20 cars by Shotwell & Schermerhorn, of Des Moines, at a price equivalent to 28¼ cents here. Among other large sellers to the packers, according to rumor, is the S. Love Kelley Co., which is reported to have sold 19 and 12 cars, respectively.

The eggs which Ford sold to Armour & Co. at Hastings and Lincoln, Nebr., belong to W. H. Holmes, formerly president of the Fox River Butter Co. This cleans up all of the holdings of Mr. Holmes, except six cars, which he says is fine stock and is holding for 28 cents. These cars are also at Hastings and Lincoln.

The steady upward trend of the egg market is best illustrated in the history of the block of eggs stored by the John M. Adams Produce Co., Boonville, Mo., this spring. This block consisted of 16 cars of Aprils and 17 cars of Junes. As reported in the News several weeks ago, Mr. Adams was here and sold the entire block to Bowman & Bull Co. at prices said to average 24¾ cents. Charles Bowman later sold the Aprils and Mays to Merrill & Eldredge and some time later bought the entire block back at an advanced price. Late last week he resold the Adams block to the Bennett-Howard Co. at 27½ cents, according to report, and these are supposed to have reached the stockyards at 28 cents.

The egg kings, Wetz & Morin, are reported to have started selling their block of 170 cars. The first batch of these to be sold was 29 cars bought by Armour & Co., which is reported to have netted Wetz & Morin a profit in the neighborhood of $27,000. Armour is also supposed to be looking at 50 cars more of Wetz & Morin's eggs, and more sales may be consummated.

Early this week West & Morin sold another 17-car block to a broker at 28 cents, who sold them in turn to an eastern buyer at one-fourth cent profit. This makes 48 cars that the egg kings have moved this week.

Although the Chicago retail trade is dull, the movement from the coolers continues heavy. The movement from the Monarch last week was the largest in the history of that storage. This week's movement from the same storage may even surpass last week, as 11,000 cases were moved Monday and over 9,000 Tuesday.

Trading on the Butter and Egg Board has been light, but it illustrates fairly well the trend of the market. Last Saturday the first car was posted at 30 cents, and the first bid of 28 cents registered. At Monday's meeting the top price for firsts thus far this season was reached when a car sold at 27½ cents. Outside of this sale the lowest offerings for firsts was at 28 cents. Extras were offered at 29 cents, with 28 cents bid freely. It was quite a surprise Tuesday when Hunter Walter sold a car of April firsts at 27 cents to Merrill & Eldredge on the board. As the market was firm, dealers were paying 27½ cents freely. In fact, the buyer was offered a nice profit on this purchase immediately after the call. The market held up firm Wednesday, although there were fewer bidders. Bowman-Bull bought a car of April extras at 28¼ cents, and 28 cents was bid for the rest of the offerings. On fall eggs 33 cents was freely bid on Octobers. Fresh eggs sold Wednesday on the board at 34 cents.

A small coterie of Chicago egg speculators who hit it right last spring write us that they had sold 21 cars at a profit of $840 each, but under present conditions they say the profit is too small, and they are holding the other 140 cars so as to make $1,200 profit on each. We hope for their sakes they can do so, but we doubt it. We have known these same speculators to be satisfied with a profit of $50 a car, but that was some other season. We are no hogs. If we had the eggs and could realize $850 a car profit we could not sell them quick enough.

[The Fayette Falcon.]

Congressman MCKELLAR introduced a bill in Congress a few days ago which, if enacted into law, will prohibit cold-storage concerns from keeping fresh meats, eggs, butter, and other perishable articles of food in storage for a longer period than three months and then ship into another State for sale. Col. MCKELLAR explained that the purpose of his bill is to keep these large packing concerns from keeping the supply of these food articles off the market to force the price up and then sell their entire holdings at enormous profit. If their operations are confined to the State in which they are operating by the bill then a corner in any of these things will be impossible, as they could be sold only in the State in which they are stored if they had been in storage longer than three months. If the bill can help to reduce the present high prices of these food articles it should be speedily passed. With her splendid natural advantages, Fayette County ought to be independent of these packers and their food supply and could be if her farmers would see the magnificent profit in stock and poultry and turn their attention to them. Eggs are selling in Somerville now at 30 and 35 cents per dozen and are scarce at that. Beef is selling here at 12½ cents per pound for the cheapest, up to 20 cents for the best steaks, and beef is being shipped here from the packing houses to meet the demand. Our farmers sell their cattle at 3 or 4 cents per pound and then buy them back at 15 and 20 cents. And no wonder we remain poor.

Mr. MCKELLAR is author of a resolution pending before the House Interstate Commerce Committee, providing heavy fines and prison punishments for cold-storage operators who keep perishable foodstuffs in their warehouses more than 90 days. Since the measure was presented, he said, he has received hundreds of letters containing charges which, even if only partially substantiated, make a serious case against the alleged storage monopoly.

"I believe that the Federal Government can, by a simple law, largely do away with this unjust use of cold storage. The scheme is simply to prohibit interstate shipments of all kinds of fresh meats, fish, butter, eggs, and the like, that have been kept in cold storage for a longer period than three months, with a fine or imprisonment, or both, for violation. Food gambling can not be excused on any ground."

Mr. MCKELLAR quoted an interview in which Director Brand, of the office of markets, blamed the hen for the egg shortage, and continued:

"I think any Egg Trust magnate or pork packer would agree with the view of this Government official. I do not believe the consumers will agree with him at all. The census shows that the production of eggs has constantly increased within the last few years, and that for a period of 10 years, while there was an increase of 21 per cent in population, there has been an increase of 23 per cent in the production of eggs. I believe an officer of the Government should be very careful of his facts before even seemingly upholding the food trusts.

"I find, also, that there are now stored in cold-storage warehouses in Pennsylvania 10,000,000 dozens of eggs and that 90 per cent of these have been in storage since April 1. This is probably relatively the case in every State in the Union, and the cold-storage men seem to be simply manipulating the market by creating an artificial scarcity. What is true of the egg situation is also true of the meat, fish, and butter situation.

"I have received many letters and newspaper clippings indorsing my bill, and, of course, I am delighted that so many approve. I understand that women's clubs are taking hold of the matter, and I hope all good citizens will cooperate with me."

[Johnson City (Tenn.) Staff, Nov. 30, 1913.]

AFTER THE EGG TRUST.

The more than 15,000 readers of the Daily Staff on this glad Thanksgiving Day will be pleased to learn that the Staff's campaign for the unscrambling of the Egg Trust is bearing fruit. Day by day for the past month we have pointed out the iniquity of this unprincipled trust that would rob the poor man of his food and snatch the crown of glory from the great American hen, week by week we have declared it has sinned away its day of grace, if it ever had any, and must be destroyed. State editors have kindly copied and commented on our editorials, Representatives in Congress have been aroused, Cabinet officials have taken notice, but the straw that broke the camel's back, that caused the country to sit up and take notice, was the inability of the White House to furnish eggs to the wedding guests. Silver and gold, frankincense and myrrh in abundance, but no eggs. Whereupon, according to Bob Gates, the well-known Washington correspondent, within the next week, special attorneys and agents all over the country are expected to file with the Attorney General's office detailed information about cold-storage houses and their handling of eggs. The Department of Justice has been informed by Congressman KENNETH MCKELLAR, of the Memphis district, that the cold-storage interests of the country, by the manipulation of markets, have caused the high prices at present being charged for food. In addition to an immediate investigation by Congress demanded by Mr. MCKELLAR, he has asked Attorney General McReynolds to assemble evidence of the reported conditions with a view to instituting criminal proceedings.

Congressman MCKELLAR told the Department of Justice that he had been informed that one storage firm actually destroyed eggs by the carload, after its warehouses had become taxed to their capacity, rather than allow the eggs to go into the retail markets and curtail the plan of "cornering" the egg market.

So it will be seen that the Staff has not overdrawn the conditions in the country at large. The late Pierpont Morgan wanted to know how it was possible to unscramble eggs, but he was not so simple as to inquire how to unscramble the Egg Trust. It is plain that Congressman MCKELLAR and the Department of Justice are on the right track, and the death knell of this unconscionable trust is soon to be sounded. Eggs-actly.

[Lockport (N. Y.) Sun, Nov. 25, 1913.]

WHY THE DIFFERENCE.

If cold storage only costs a cent and a half a dozen on eggs, why does the price jump from 18 cents or thereabouts to 40 and 50 cents between spring and this season of the year? This is the question which every consumer considers when he applauds the demand of the United States Attorney General that there shall be an investigation made of the various storage and commission houses throughout the country to determine how many eggs they have been holding through the summer, and how long.

Congressman MCKELLAR claims the hen is not to blame, and it is a generally accepted fact that the cornering of the markets is responsible. That game is even carried into Niagara County, where eggs are bought up and rushed to city storehouses during the summer season. It is somewhat the same with butter. It is told of the butter buyers that they pay as low as 15 cents to the farmers and then hold for the inflated winter tariffs which the poor consumers have to meet. Eternity should have a warm place for those who gamble in foodstuffs.

[Boston Transcript, Nov. 24, 1913.]

SPECULATION AND COLD STORAGE.

Of course when an abnormal situation from which the public suffers exists, those who are suspected of being responsible for it may be expected to be prepared with some plausible explanations. These have not been lacking when a justification of the unprecedented prices of eggs has been called for. The law of supply and demand is invoked to account for them. The hens are moulting and have been holding up their wares, and so forth. Everybody knows that there is an annual period of shortage in strictly fresh eggs, but the surprise this year has been that it set in so early and has lasted so long. It dates back to August and is gradually increasing in acuteness. The public is naturally curious to learn the bottom reasons for conditions that are this year so extraordinary. We have had hints of similar situations in former years, but we have now been suffering from poor eggs and high prices for a full quarter of a year, and the end is not yet in sight.

It can hardly be said that there is a scarcity of eggs. If anyone is satisfied with the cold-storage variety he can get all he is disposed to pay for at prices but little more than a half of those asked for those that more nearly approach freshness. But people who have all their lives had the benefit of fresh eggs do not wish to be compelled to subsist on the cold-storage substitutes, at least beyond the time when natural conditions are operative. Those engaged in the business claim that natural conditions can explain everything. Thus far they have inside information to an almost exclusive extent, and so the consumer is at a disadvantage in attempting to sustain his protests. But he is none the less dissatisfied with the explanations that are handed out to him, and the investigation of the cold-storage interests that has been proposed to Congress by one of its Members will probably receive the approval of the great majority of egg consumers.

Congressman MCKELLAR, of Tennessee, who has announced his purpose of pushing this investigation, has gleaned from the census that while there was an increase of 21 per cent in the population, there was an increase of 23 per cent in the production of eggs. His remedy for the present situation is a law that will largely do away with the unjust use of cold storage. "The scheme is simply to prohibit interstate shipments of all kinds of fresh meats, fish, butter, eggs, and the like that have been kept in cold storage for a longer period than three months, with fine or imprisonment, or both, for violation." This would be independent of the question of how long food can be kept in cold storage and still be wholesome. There is a wide difference of opinion on that point even among those who claim to be experts. But it is obvious that so long as there is no reasonably definite limit to the period, the opportunity for speculation and cornering is wide open, and the longer the exorbitant rates prevail the stronger grows the belief that this opportunity has been improved.

If this belief is not well founded, an investigation that would disclose the fundamental facts would be a benefit to the great dealers who individually and through combinations control the market, and they should be the first to welcome such action. It is conceded that cold storage is an agency in the equalization of food supplied throughout the year that can be, and indeed has been, of great service to the public. But it is an agency that under, and it is important to consumers to learn whether or not that has been the case with respect to at least one of our most important food staples, and perhaps others. The sporadic boycott of dealers, a crusade which the housewives are leading in some cities, is not likely to have widely corrective results. It will have as little effect upon the main problem as Mrs. Partington's broom had upon the Atlantic. It is a situation that seems to be entirely worthy of the Government's attention.

[Memphis Scimitar, Dec. 1, 1913.]

A WISE MEASURE.

The bill introduced in Congress by Representative MCKELLAR the other day, after several consultations with the Attorney General, is a measure that should be enacted into law at as early a date as possible. It provides for the regulation of transportation of certain food products, and would prohibit the shipment and sale of adulterated or misbranded articles. It provides for an effective system of regulation of cold storage and the dealing in cold-storage food products, and fixes severe penalties, including fines of from $100 to $1,000 for each offense, and imprisonment for terms not exceeding five years. Some sort of a measure is necessary to bring an end to the gambling that is now so general in food products and to prevent the adulteration and misbranding of the necessities of life. The public at large has no protection in this matter, and the middlemen or retailers, who handle these articles, are quite as helpless as the general public, because they can not tell whether or not an article purchased from a broker or a manufacturer in a distant city is what it is represented to be. The prison punishment will prove to be a greater deterrent than any mere monetary amercement could hope to be. Rich men care very little for fines, but they seriously object to being sent to prison for a term of years.

[Los Angeles Examiner, Dec. 1, 1913.]

A PRACTICAL ATTACK ON A CORNER IN EGGS.

Representative KENNETH D. MCKELLAR, of Memphis, Tenn., is going after the Egg Trust in a way that promises results.

He has now before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce a bill punishing with fines and imprisonment shippers over interstate lines of fresh meats, vegetables, eggs, or other foodstuffs which have been in storage over 90 days.

He will also present to the regular session of Congress, opening today, a resolution providing for a congressional investigation of the cold-storage system and methods.

Both the bill and the resolution should pass. That the present extortionate price of eggs is due wholly to the aid which the cold-storage warehousemen give to those engaged in cornering the market is notorious. Other foodstuffs are doubtless manipulated the same way. Instead of being an invention of supreme value to man, the speculators in their greed have made it a part of the gambler's equipment.

Representative MCKELLAR is on the right track. His bill should be one of the first measures reported to the regular session.

[Houston Daily Post, Houston, Tex., Dec. 1, 1913.]

COLD-STORAGE REGULATION.

If Congress devotes serious consideration to the cold-storage regulation bill, introduced by Representative MCKELLAR, of Tennessee, it will begin to get close to one of the many causes of the high cost of living. The high cost of food is, of course, most responsible for excessive living expenses. During the past 10 years the price of nearly all the important foodstuffs has risen to almost wartime levels, and nothing that our economists have been able to do has given relief. During the campaign of last year the cost of living was a dominant issue, and the demand for tariff reduction was strengthened in all the centers of population because the people were led to believe that lower duties on foodstuffs and clothing would lighten the terrific pressure upon the earnings of labor.

Acting in harmony with that theory, nearly all foodstuffs were placed upon the free list, and yet with the new law in full operation foodstuffs seem destined to reach higher levels than ever before.

The McKellar idea, however, if carried out upon the scale he proposes, is very likely to produce results. By limiting the period for which any article may be kept in storage and providing severe penalties for violating these regulations the markets of the great cities will be more abundantly supplied in all likelihood, and this abundance is apt to cause a recession of prices.

The McKellar bill would make the maximum period of storage on beef or its products seven months; veal, two months; pork, four months; sheep or goats, four months; lambs or kids, three months; poultry and game, three months; fish, two months; eggs, three months to six months, with provision for labeling all over three months old after inspection; butter, three months. The bill proposes that cold-storage articles must be labeled with the dates of production, killing, packing, or manufacturing, and period of storage. It would bar thawing out cold-storage products, would have regulations issued by the Department of Agriculture, and provide other precautions.

After providing against long storage of foodstuffs the bill provides that packers of meat, poultry, butter, and eggs and all cold-storage concerns must furnish to the Government daily statements of goods on hand, shipments, receipts, and deliveries, in violation of which fines ranging from $100 to $1,000 or prison sentences not exceeding five years may be imposed.

At present the cold-storage establishments are enabled to gauge the volume of products supplied to the markets. They enforce a condition of scarcity at all times regardless of the production, and in this way the market is set upon a keen edge. Not only is this true, but the power to conserve and hold invests the men who control the markets with the power to fix the prices at which the producers must sell. Thus the producer is exploited on the one hand and the consumer on the other.

It will require skillful treatment of this subject to bring relief without subjecting the producers to ill treatment, and this point will have to be watched. Men enjoying the power that the great cold-storage men have are loath to part with it, and the law will have to be strong at all points to become advantageously effective.

But when all that is possible shall have been done, full relief for the consumer and justice to the producer will not have been accomplished until many other reforms are adopted, and the individual will have to perform an important part supplementary to the law before we shall hear the last of the high cost of living.

[Hartford (Conn.) Post, Dec. 1, 1913.]

NEW COLD-STORAGE BILL.

A most drastic bill providing for the control of cold storage has been introduced in the lower House by Congressman MCKELLAR, of Tennessee.

This bill provides for close Federal control of the products of the country in so far as the cold-storage plants are concerned. It not only proposes to regulate the cold storage of foodstuffs but it also proposes to penalize agreements for storage, pooling, division of territory, interference with competition, or other restraint of trade in foodstuffs. It provides that beef can not be kept in cold storage longer than seven months; veal, two months; pork, four months; sheep or goats, four months; lambs or kids, three months; poultry and game, three months; fish, two months; eggs, three to six months, with a provision for labeling all over three months; butter, three months. The bill also provides that all cold-storage articles must be labeled with the dates of production, killing, packing, or manufacturing, and period of storage.

All of which sounds good to the consumer and the producer alike, but which may be robbed of its teeth by a number of very simple devices known to the cold-storage people. One might say with perfect truth that there are already enough laws to control the entire food situation, but somehow they are never invoked to the advantage of the common people. When great combinations of capital can succeed in delaying final judgment in cases brought against them for enough years until practically all of the persons originally interested are either dead or worn out, the chances of the common people getting a square deal through any law, no matter how good, are about nil.

If the Congressman from Tennessee can attach to his bill, and get it into the statute books, some provision whereby suits against the cold-storage and other people who control the foodstuffs of the Nation can be begun automatically and pushed with vigor in the interest of justice and equity for all concerned, he will have achieved a great benefit for the common people of the country.

M'KELLAR'S BILL.

Representative MCKELLAR, of Memphis, has introduced in Congress a bill which is likely to have a favorable hearing. It forbids the transportation in interstate commerce of food products that have been in storage more than 90 days. It is likely that the bill will be amended if it is passed, but the basic idea is widely commended. A number of the States have established time limits to the storage of foodstuffs. Pennsylvania storage houses are to be required to rid themselves of 9,000,000 eggs before December 1. But the price of eggs in Pennsylvania cities is not falling as that period approaches. It is supposed that the egg dealers will ship eggs into other States.

The objects of the McKellar bill are to give the States adequate control of cold-storage foodstuffs.

The time limit on the storage of eggs is not the same as on the storage of other foodstuffs, and it may be found necessary to give the subject detailed and scientific study in order that the Federal legislation may point the way for model regulation in the States and may not unduly hamper the interstate trade in foodstuffs. One of the needs of the country is a model storage law which all the States might adopt and which the Federal Government could support through its control of interstate commerce.

CONTROL COLD STORAGE.

Federal and State control of food products held in cold storage is contemplated by a bill introduced by Representative MCKELLAR, of Memphis. An exchange comments:

COLD STORAGE AND EGGS.

Representative MCKELLAR, of Tennessee, announces his purpose of pushing a congressional investigation of the cold-storage business and of placing upon the statute books a law to prohibit interstate shipments of all kinds of fresh meats, butter, fish, eggs, and other like perishables that have been kept in cold storage for a longer period than three months.

Mr. MCKELLAR has discovered that in the last year population has increased 21 per cent and the production of eggs 23 per cent. He therefore concludes that cold storage is chiefly responsible for the rising prices. The bill he proposes applies merely to interstate shipments and does not pass on the question as to how long perishables may be kept in cold storage and still be wholesome.

There has been a growing scarcity of eggs since August, and it is natural that the public should credit the shortage to efforts on the part of cold-storage operators to corner the market.

Attorney General McReynolds has ordered a cold-storage investigation and criminal prosecutions are likely. Chicago has nearly half the egg cold-storage capacity in the United States and is said to have on hand 350,000 cases of eggs, each containing 30 dozen. In the 44 cold-storage warehouses in the United States there were reported, on November 1, 1,562,800 cases of eggs.

Cold storage is a new wrinkle in distribution, and when brought under effectual regulation should have the effect either of reducing prices or of preventing their advance. However, if it is to be used by speculators for the purpose of exploiting the public, the sooner the Government intervenes the better.

Legal technicalities will not be heard against the merits of the controversy. The public safety and the public welfare is the supreme law.

CONGRESS AND COLD STORAGE.

The House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, of which Congressman Adamson is chairman, will meet in Washington to-morrow to consider several bills which have been referred to it providing for Federal regulation of the business of cold storage.

One of these bills was drawn up by Congressman MCKELLAR, of Tennessee, and proposes to make it a crime to keep food products of a perishable nature, such as meat and eggs, in cold storage for more than 90 days. In the opinion of many Congressmen the McKellar bill is too drastic, and a fairer and better way of dealing with the problem would be to provide for the labeling of all cold-storage products with the date of their admission to the warehouses, so that the purchasing public would know what it is getting and be able to use its own judgment. The theory of this program is that such labels would prevent articles from being kept in storehouses inordinately long, because consumers would discriminate in favor of fresh food, and dealers would have to dispose of their stocks within a reasonable time or face deterioration in the value of their products.

The public's grievances against cold-storage methods as they have developed under existing conditions which provide no legal regulation fall under two heads, one of which is that the cornering of products frequently enables the cold-storage men to produce artificial scarcity and command abnormal prices; the other, that holding perishable food products in cold storage for long periods results in their deterioration, and when they are placed on the market, with no indication of the length of time for which they have been stored, they become a menace to the health of the consumers.

Consumers have a right to know the history of what they buy. They have a right to protect their stomachs. The plan of dating cold-storage products looks reasonable to the consuming public, however much it may be opposed by men engaged in the business of cold storage.

ATTACKING A CORNER IN EGGS.

AFTER THE COLD-STORAGE TRUST.

If Congressman KENNETH D. McKELLAR, of Tennessee, has his way cold storage and its effect on the price of foodstuffs will be investigated by a congressional committee this winter, and Congress will pass a law that will largely destroy the power of the cold-storage interests to manipulate the market and boost prices by creating an artificial scarcity of the necessaries of life.

"It is bad enough to gamble on poker, horse races, cotton futures, and the like when you go into the gamble with your eyes open and both sides know what they are doing," says Mr. McKELLAR, "but when a few men get together and corner the market on necessaries of life without the knowledge or consent of the people they rob it is certainly carrying the thing too far. I believe that the Federal Government can, by a simple law, largely do away with this unjust use of cold storage. Food gambling can not be excused on any ground."

The law which Representative McKELLAR has in mind and which he has announced he will introduce early in the present regular session of Congress would prohibit interstate shipments of all kinds of fresh meats, fish, butter, eggs, and the like that have been kept in cold storage for a longer period than three months, with fine and imprisonment, or both, for violation. The Tennessee Congressman will also demand a congressional investigation of the effect of cold storage upon food prices. In the meantime the Department of Justice is engaged in a nation-wide preliminary inquiry into the cold-storage business, with a view of disclosing whether or not a combination exists to keep up prices.

There is little doubt in the public mind that the cold-storage interests are responsible for the present high prices of eggs and other articles of food that have advanced to fancy figures. Census figures show a constant increase in the production of eggs, yet eggs are now unusually scarce and the price is unusually high. Probably the explanation can be found in the fact that there are now in cold-storage warehouses in Pennsylvania alone 10,000,000 dozens of eggs, 90 per cent of which have been in storage since April 1, or eight months. And it is safe to say that this is relatively the case in every State of the Union.

If these hundreds of millions of dozens of eggs were thrown upon the market fast enough to meet the demand the price would fall until it would be fair both to the cold-storage people and to the consumers. Therefore the storage interests can hardly escape the suspicion that they are holding these eggs to create an artificial scarcity and raise prices to an unreasonable figure.

It is hoped that the movement started by Mr. McKELLAR will result in the solution of the problem involved in trust manipulation of the market on the necessaries of life. That is the next number of the Democratic legislative program.

LIMITING COLD STORAGE.

There seems to be much to commend in the bill of Representative McKELLAR, of Tennessee, now pending before the House, and having for its object the lowering of the cost of living. The bill seeks to attain its object by labeling all foodstuffs with the length of time they have been in cold storage and by strictly limiting the duration of their stay in warehouses. The bill provides that eggs shall be stored only 3 months at the outside; beef, 7 months; veal, 2 months; pork, sheep, and goats, 4 months; lamb, game, and poultry, 3 months; fish, 2 months; and butter, 3 months. To the consumer, some of the periods mentioned may appear to be too long, but that is a matter to be determined by the Congress after proper hearings.

Certainly the subject of food storage is a national one and should be treated through national legislation. The conflicting interests of the States must not enter the matter at all. Government from time immemorial has claimed and exercised the right to regulate food prices, and existing conditions seem to call now for sumptuary legislation for their remedy.

[Tribune, Tacoma, Wash., Dec. 3, 1913.]

AFTER THE FOOD TRUSTS.

Scores of bills were introduced in Congress on the opening day of the December session proposing various remedies for existing high prices, which may be traced to cold storage and manipulation by the dealers in foodstuffs. Congressman McKELLAR, of Tennessee, has offered a bill which has the indorsement of a majority of the members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The McKellar bill provides punishing with fines and imprisonment of shippers over interstate lines of fresh meats, vegetables, eggs, or other foodstuffs which have been in storage over 90 days. He will also present a resolution providing for a congressional investigation of the cold-storage system and methods.

Both the bill and the resolution should pass. That the present extortionate price of eggs is due wholly to the aid which the cold-storage warehousemen give to those engaged in cornering the market is notorious. Other foodstuffs are doubtless manipulated the same way. Instead of being an invention of supreme value to man, the speculators, in their greed, have made it a part of the gamblers' equipment.

[Journal-Tribune, Knoxville, Tenn., Dec. 4, 1913.]

COLD STORAGE.

Mr. McKELLAR, Representative in Congress from the tenth district of Tennessee, is the author of a bill for the regulation of cold storage of provisions. Cold storage, if not abused, is a good thing for the country. It has been demonstrated that many articles of food may be thus preserved without detriment to the wholesomeness of their qualities.

But it can do no harm and is no great hardship on the part of those engaged in the business if they are required to label the articles stored, giving date, so the purchaser may know what he is buying. Articles that have long been in cold storage need not be sold as fresh, when they are not fresh.

The feature of the case that calls for regulation is that speculators may buy when things are selling cheap, and hold until scarcity and demand may run up prices to exorbitant figures. In the doing of that, prices, when they should be lower, when the producer expects lower prices, may be kept up by buying and putting articles on cold storage. Thus there is never a time when the consumer may have the benefit of low prices.

Most complaint is probably made regarding eggs. The speculators buy up the eggs in a season when they are most plentiful, take them out of the markets, place them in cold storage, and hold them until a time when the hens are doing less laying, thus getting the benefit of buying at a very low price and selling at a very high price. Thus it is neither the producers nor the consumers get the benefit of fluctuations in the markets.

If this is not a combination in restraint of trade, what is there that may be called such a combination?

[Milwaukee Free Press, Dec. 9, 1913.]

COLD STORAGE.

Representative McKELLAR, of Tennessee, has introduced a bill designed to regulate the interstate shipment of cold-storage products. This is getting at the suspected abuse in question in the right way.

We are unfamiliar with the provisions of the McKellar bill; more than this, we believe that such legislation should wait until the Department of Justice is through with its probe of the storage situation. But this does not alter the fact that Federal law is the proper avenue for working correction.

A number of States have in recent years enacted statutes to curb the abuses of the cold-storage business. There have been numerous searching State probes. Some of the regulations thus enforced have improved the character of the stored goods, but, on the whole, this State legislation has not noticeably changed conditions.

The suspected illegitimate manipulation has scarcely been touched, and there lies the greatest public interest.

The fault does not so much lie in the laws as in their inability to get at a business which is so largely interstate in character.

Therefore the Federal law must step in; but before that is done Congress should know something more about the business it tries to regulate than mere suspicion and prejudice.

That is why it should be desirable to await the developments of the probe instituted by the Attorney General.

[Birmingham Age-Herald, Dec. 10, 1913.]

THE M'KELLAR BILL.

The introduction by Representative McKELLAR, of Tennessee, of a bill in the House of Representatives designed to prevent the cornering of foodstuffs by market speculators is timely, with the whole Nation stirred by the present price on eggs. "I can not conceive," he declares, "of any greater crime against the public than cornering of the market of foodstuffs."

Mr. McKELLAR charges that by use of cold storage, warehouse gamblers, whom he terms "voracious vultures of the market place," have frequently established themselves in a position where they could practically dictate the price of any food to the whole Nation. This he believes is wrong, as does every man affected by the matter, which is saying the entire population of the United States.

No one, of course, will underrate for a moment the value of the cold-storage industry. It is, indeed, one of the great boons in our modern life; but the speculators who take advantage of its possibilities for the purpose of controlling the price of food must always incur resentful opposition on the part of the public.

This practice of food speculation should be stopped, and if such drastic measures as are contained in the proposed law are necessary to cope with the situation, then they should by all means be enacted. There has been great agitation in regard to speculation in cotton futures, but this affecting the cost of food is a much more serious problem. At best the futures question touched only a part of the United States, but when a staple food product is cornered and the price forced up to an abnormally high level then every man who consumes that commodity is directly affected.

Another commendable feature of the McKellar bill is that section making it illegal to ship adulterated and misbranded food products in interstate commerce and limiting the periods in which food products may be held in storage without becoming adulterated.

Doubtless the bill needs some amendments, but in the main it is sound and should be passed by the Congress.

[Knoxville Journal-Tribune, Dec. 10, 1913.]

COLD STORAGE AND PRICES.

Congressman McKELLAR has undoubtedly struck a popular chord in the preparation and introduction of a bill for the regulation of cold storage. For a number of years there has been kindled a fire in the hearts of the people of this country prejudicial to cold storage. Recently, with or without just cause, it has broken out as a flame.

It all comes from the high cost of some of the articles of food kept in cold storage. It is said and believed that those engaged in the business have not dealt with the public fairly; that, in fact, a greediness has been shown to get rich quickly at the expense of those who live by eating.

It will not be denied that cold storage has its uses. Some articles of food may be kept for quite a long time without suffering in quality. In fact, it is claimed that there are some such articles that are improved in quality by being kept in cold storage.

But the trouble is, according to those who are making complaints, speculators have embraced the opportunity offered by the system of cold storage to buy and store commodities and hold them in such quantities as to make the demand in the open markets greater than the supply. The holders may hold until prices become exorbitant, and then turn loose in quantities only sufficient to meet demands without glutting markets and lowering prices.

The bill of which Congressman MCKELLAR, of this State, is the author is meant to remedy such a situation as that by the regulation by the Government of cold-storage establishments. Commenting upon this bill, the Washington Star, among other things, remarks:

"If the cold-storage warehouses are used to raise the prices for these necessities above the normal range, a crime is being committed against the public welfare that calls for punishment. The Department of Justice should be able to ascertain how far an agency that ought to work out to the advantage of the public is employed to its detriment. But punishment alone is not enough. Some method should be found to prevent such a misuse of the cold-storage facilities in the future through inspection and check. This is a large order, but the Government, assisted by the State and city agencies, can accomplish it. Representative MCKELLAR'S bill proposes a plan to this end, and an early report on it to the House is desirable. The Department of Agriculture is in possession of trustworthy information at all seasons respecting the volume of produce for the meeting of public food needs."

The high cost of eggs is not due to actual shortage in the production. Congressman MCKELLAR, of Tennessee, who is interesting himself in the cold-storage question, claims that while the population has increased 21 per cent, the egg production has advanced 23 per cent. Similar figures would be obtained by investigation in other directions. It is not true that the food supply is diminishing in proportion to the rise in prices.

TO REGULATE STORAGE.

Representative MCKELLAR, of Tennessee, has introduced a bill in the National House of Representatives that possesses merit, in view of the experiences of the public in the last two years with the Cold Storage Trust. It provides for a restriction of cold storage, and penalties for agreements for storage, pooling, division of territory, and interference with competition or other restraint upon the movement of foodstuffs. It fixes the maximum time for keeping beef in cold storage at seven months; veal, two months; pork, four months; sheep or goats, four months; lambs or kids, three months; poultry and game, three months; eggs, three months to six months, with a provision requiring the labeling of all over three months old. Butter may be kept only three months, and fish two months.

The bill requires that cold-storage keepers must list with the Government pure-food inspectors daily statements of the food on hand; the receipts for storage and the outgo, with dates of the storage of the goods shipped out, the Government to have access for inspection at any time; and fines ranging from $100 to $1,000 and imprisonment are provided for violations of the law.

It is stated from Washington that Representative MCKELLAR'S bill has the approval of the Attorney General and has been very carefully drawn; also that it has the approval of many Members of Congress, who express the belief that such a measure will do much to break down the artificial manipiulation of foodstuffs.

Some such measure of relief is badly needed. The consumers complain that they have been bled outrageously by the amalgamation of the cold-storage interests. The opinion seems to be that this measure is what is needed by the country, and that it will be among the first bills passed by the new session of Congress.

REGULATION OF COLD STORAGE.

The bill which Representative MCKELLAR, of Tennessee, is framing to govern the cold storage of food is a natural addition to the pure-food laws. We can remember the great opposition that was directed against all pure-food measures 15 and 20 years ago. When the national pure-food laws were finally passed and we began to experience the good effects of their regulations, we wondered that such statutes had been delayed so long.

The earlier pure-food provisions dealt with the natural or the manufactured products, and little or no attention was paid to cold storage. The benefits of cold storage seemed to outweigh the possible evil. It was regarded as a great boon for mankind, and there was little disposition to interfere with its growth. Soon, however, the evils began to assume threatening proportions, and the public to realize that cold storage was an aid to monopoly and high prices; and, moreover, that foods placed on the market out of cold storage often were tainted and seldom as nutritive and appetizing as the natural product.

It would be impossible to abolish cold storage in the present state of civilization. If we complain of high prices now as a result of the system, we would find more reason to complain should the system be done away with entirely. In order to provide vast populations with food, cold storage has become a necessity. It is true that the packers hold their goods in times of plenty so that they may charge high prices in times of scarcity: but it is also true that if the surplus were not held over into the lean days the scarcity would be intensified to the point of famine.

In passing any laws against cold storage, therefore, the beneficent results of the system will be taken into consideration. Even the Democrats will not insist on "smashing the trust," but will seek only to regulate it. Representative MCKELLAR'S bill will penalize agreements for storage, pooling, division of territory, interference with competition, or other restraint of trade in foodstuffs, and will set limits on the time during which meat, fish, eggs, poultry, game, and butter may be kept in cold storage. It provides also that cold-storage articles must be labeled with the dates of production, killing, packing, or manufacture, and periods of storage. It would place a ban on the thawing out of products and would have special regulations made by the Department of Agriculture as further protection.

All this is a laudable attempt to eliminate evils that are crying out for remedy. The trust methods are especially onerous, because they add to the high cost of living. It is widely believed that middlemen, such as packers and cold-storage people generally, are taking too many and too great profits. By interfering with competition and by imposing restraints on trade in foodstuffs a vast number of unnecessary middlemen are brought into existence, and statutes directed against these evils are apt to throw out of business a considerable number of middlemen and thereby bring the producer and consumer into more direct dealing on a more economical basis.
